Oral Answers to Questions

ENERGY

British Coal

1. Mr. Gow: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what progress he has made with his plans to denationalise British Coal; and if he will make a statement.

2. Mr. Rost: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he plans to allow more private sector involvement in United Kingdom coal production.

The Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Cecil Parkinson): We intend to privatise the coal industry after the next general election. We are currently considering the options; no decisions have yet been made.

Mr. Gow: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the very strong support for his proposals, not only among Conservative Members, but among those who work in the mining industry, and notably among a growing number of members of the National Union of Mineworkers? Will he confirm that the Bill to privatise the British coal industry will be introduced in the first Session of the new Parliament?

Mr. Parkinson: I can tell my hon. Friend that we shall come forward with a Bill as soon as possible in the new Parliament. Whether that will be in the first Session depends on a number of factors, but it will be very early in the new Parliament and the industry will be privatised in the first half of the new Parliament.

Mr. Rost: If privatisation has to wait until after the next election, can we at least have confirmation of assurances that there will be some liberalisation of the rather tight coal monopoly in the immediate future by amending the nationalisation Act to allow the private sector at least to become involved in competition with the nationalised industry as a first step to full privatisation?

Mr. Parkinson: I know that a number of people have been promoting that idea. I should prefer to tackle the problems of the industry as a whole and to come forward with proposals in the next Parliament for the ultimate liberalisation, which is the privatisation of the whole industry.

Mr. Hardy: Will the Secretary of State comment on recent reports that there is keen interest in a management board buy-out of British Coal? Even if he were to confirm that interest, would he maintain the position that he has just stated, which is that there will be no privatisation before the next election and no attempts to prepare the way so that, if the country is unfortunate enough to have a Conservative Administration after the next election, the work will not have been largely done?

Mr. Parkinson: I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he seeks. There will be no attempt at partial or back-door privatisation in this Parliament. The issue will be placed firmly before the British people and we look forward to the Leader of the Opposition, accompanied by Mr. Scargill, touring the country opposing the proposal at the next election.

Mr. Lofthouse: Is the Secretary of State aware that his hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) is completely out of touch with the views of miners if he thinks that they support privatisation? Is he aware that miners in this country are familiar with the accident rate in the private sector of American mines, which gives a ratio of four to one compared with British mines, and that, in view of the previous safety record of privatised British mines, they fear a return to privatisation which will see a deterioration in the safety record of the mines compared with that of British Coal? Will he give us an assurance that that will not happen?

Mr. Parkinson: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that there will be no lessening of the regulations governing mine safety. I hope that he draws the pleasure that I do from noting that, in recent years, the increase in productivity has been accompanied by a fall in the number of accidents, giving the lie to the argument that one can achieve improved performance only by putting people's lives at risk.

Mr. McLoughlin: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that, despite the scare stories often put about by the leader of the National Union of Mineworkers that productivity has a trade off with safety, nationalisation does not mean safer mines, and has nothing to do with safer mines, and there is no need for any fears about the safety of the British coalmining industry, whether in the nationalised or the private sector?

Mr. Parkinson: Let me repeat what I said to the hon. Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse). There will be no lessening of the regulations governing safety, regardless of ownership. The coal industry has been giving the lie to one of the favourite truisms pushed about by the Labour party, which is that we can improve performance only by risking lives. We have been achieving better performance and fewer injuries, and that is the proof that the Labour party is wrong.

Mr. McCartney: Will the Secretary of State confirm that the Opencast Executive will not be privatised as a single unit before denationalisation of the whole industry? Does he intend to wait until that time and then have it denationalised either as a single unit or part of a regional denationalisation?

Mr. Parkinson: I have already told the House that we have no detailed plans. We have looked carefully at a range of options and shall be working out those options still further. The management buy-out mentioned by the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) is one of the very interesting possibilities. That is not ruled out, but we are looking at the whole range of options.

Central Electricity Generating Board

3. Mr. Franks: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board; and what matters he expects to discuss.

Mr. Parkinson: I regularly meet the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to discuss a variety of issues.

Mr. Franks: Will my right hon. Friend note the case of the Roosecote power station at Barrow-in-Furness, which was decommissioned by the CEGB in November 1986 and for which private sector tenders were invited in February with an April deadline for decision by September? Will my right hon. Friend inquire which September the chairman had in mind and whether it is to be before or after privatisation of the industry? Will my right hon. Friend also inform the chairman that failure to maintain a station, as well as being neglect of a public asset, is a highly effective means of frustrating private sector competition?

Mr. Parkinson: I am pleased to be able to tell my hon. Friend that the tenders have been reviewed, the group which is to take the station has been identified and final negotiations about terms of the contract are now under way.

Ms. Quin: When the right hon. Gentleman next meets the chairman of the CEGB, will he discuss the need to avoid over-reliance on coal imports, especially in view of the worsening balance of payments?

Mr. Parkinson: Yes. I believe that British Coal has a very good opportunity to secure the overwhelming proportion of our coal market. That is why the Government have provided more than £9 billion for the industry since we took office and why more than £6 billion has been invested in modernisation so that our industry can produce competitive coal and hold its own in the market place.

Mr. Hannam: In view of the concern about acid rain and pollution from coal-fired power stations, will my right hon. Friend discuss the matter with the chairman of the CEGB, particularly with regard to measures being carried out for the control of emissions? Can he give us any idea of the level of carbon dioxide emission from coal-fired power stations and how much expenditure on control is planned for the next few years?

Mr. Parkinson: In 1985, the last year for which records are available, 235 million tonnes of carbon dioxide were emitted into the atmosphere from our fossil fuel stations. We believe that a substantial programme is needed to clean up emissions. That is why the CEGB has already embarked on a very substantial programme, and more will follow.

Mr. Blair: No doubt the Secretary of State will be discussing electricity privatisation with the chairman of the CEGB. Is he aware of reports suggesting that the Government plan a special tax after privatisation to make nuclear energy attractive to private investors? Will he deny unequivocally that any such plans exist? If not, will he explain why the demands of privatisation rank above the interests of the 22 million captive consumers of electricity?

Mr. Parkinson: I begin by congratulating the hon. Gentleman on his election to the shadow Cabinet and expressing the traditional hope that he will spend many happy years on the Opposition Front Bench.

We have a declared policy that 15 to 20 per cent. of our electricity will be supplied from nuclear sources because we believe that diversity of supply is essential to security. There will, therefore, be a nuclear component. The question of nuclear economics is extremely hard to settle. We are talking about building power stations which will still be operating 45 years from now. No one expects fossil fuels to maintain their present prices for more than a few years, so in the next few years what the hon. Gentleman regards as a nuclear burden could well become a nuclear contribution. The Government are determined to ensure that we have a sufficient nuclear component in our electricity supplies.

Dr. Michael Clark: During my right hon. Friend's meeting with the chairman of the CEGB, did he discuss the future closure of Dounreay? Were any plans put forward for job creation schemes in that part of Scotland, bearing in mind that many people will be made redundant? Did he also discuss the continuation of the high-technology research for which Dounreay is famous?

Mr. Parkinson: As my hon. Friend knows, I announced the Government's policy on the fast reactor a few months ago. We have recognised our obligation to Caithness and Sutherland by ensuring that Dounreay will be phased out over a long period. Indeed, there will still be substantial employment at Dounreay for the next eight or nine years and, after that, continuing employment for about one quarter of the labour force.

It is clear that there will be no need for such technology in 30 to 40 years' time. Indeed, there is no way that Dounreay could be kept open for the whole of that time, because the nuclear reactor itself has, at the outside, a life of only about 10 years. We are maintaining our commitment to Dounreay and maintaining a substantial position in fast reactor technology. After Dounreay closes there will be a core research programme to ensure that we maintain our position in that technology.

British Coal

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of British Coal; and what matters were discussed.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Michael Spicer): My right hon. Friend and I meet the chairman of British Coal regularly to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

Mr. Janner: Has the Minister discussed with British Coal the delay in the announcement of any further opening of pits in the Vale of Belvoir in Leicestershire, other than the Asfordby pit? As the Secretary of State said earlier that British Coal has a good opportunity to secure a major proportion of our coal market, what are the Government's plans for making use of the cheap and excellent coal available in the Vale of Belvoir? How will they ensure that the skilled and devoted miners will not continue to be slowly put out of work?

Mr. Spicer: The hon. and learned Gentleman will have been pleased to note the agreement on six-day working between the UDM and British Coal at the Asfordby pit, which was one of the major sticking points in its development. Work is now proceeding at some rate. As for other pits in the area, Hawkhurst Moor is not far away, and I understand that a planning inquiry for that pit is due in January 1989.

Mr. Ashby: Did my hon. Friend discuss with the chairman the early introduction of a Bill on mining subsidence? If he did not, did he discuss the introduction by British Coal of a method of practice in line with the White Paper on mining subsidence? Is British Coal anticipating a Bill and doing now what it will have to do later?

Mr. Spicer: We have discussed both those questions with the chairman and his officials. There are a number of ways in which British Coal can improve its present practices on subsidence. The Waddilove report has been published and at an early opportunity we shall introduce legislation to comply with its recommendations.

Mr. Redmond: When do the Minister and the Secretary of State intend to get off their backsides and stop behaving like Pontius Pilate? When will they ensure that retired miners who produced coal for this country throughout two world wars have sufficient fuel for themselves? Will he talk to the chairman of British Coal and ensure that those lads and lasses have the fuel that they require to keep warm during the coming winter?

Mr. Spicer: This matter has been discussed. In fact, the hon. Gentleman took part in an Adjournment debate on it. There are restrictions on how far back such concessions can go. They are a matter for British Coal. I shall certainly pass on the hon. Gentleman's remarks, but the situation is as it stands, and as he knows it.

Renewable Energy Supplies

5. Mr. Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is his latest estimate of the percentage of United Kingdom energy supplies met by renewable sources; and if he will make a statement about the potential for raising this figure.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Our research and development programme indicates that fuel from waste and energy from wind and tidal sources are the most promising renewable technologies for the future. Each could provide up to 3 per cent. of our total energy requirements by the year 2025.

Mr. Chapman: As my hon. Friend's reply seems to show that the potential for renewable sources to meet part of Britain's energy needs is greater than was thought a few years ago, does he agree that it is essential to continue Government funding for research? Will he confirm that, under this Government, such funds for research have more than quadrupled?

Mr. Spicer: I confirm that there has been a substantial increase in research into renewable energies, as my hon. Friend has said. I confirm also that it is planned to rise in the near future. My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The Government believe that those varied energy sources are of enormous importance, and the Government are putting a tremendous amount of effort into research into them.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: In the light of the Secretary of State's claim that he is concerned about workers in the Dounreay area and their future employment prospects, has the Department looked seriously at the possibility of Dounreay being turned into a wind and wave research centre? It would undoubtedly provide employment opportunities for the people who live there. Dounreay is ideally situated because of prevailing weather conditions.

Mr. Spicer: Parts of Scotland are attractive from the point of view of wind power, and the Orkneys are an example. That is why wind power development has taken place in that part of the country. Further plans and developments may be possible, but developments are a matter for power generating companies. We have every reason to believe that more and more private power companies will come forward with projects based upon renewable sources, and they may take place in Scotland.

Nuclear Energy

6. Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what his Department is doing to reduce harm to the environment by promoting the increased use of nuclear energy in relation to fossil fuels.

Mr. Parkinson: The Governments's commitment to continued diversity of fuel supply, including a suitable nuclear component, will help reduce potentially harmful emissions from fossil-fuelled power stations.

Mr. Bruce: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Surely we are far behind the rest of the world, particularly France, which has a nuclear component of over 70 per cent., and America and Japan have much higher nuclear components than Britain. Those nations are doing far more than we are to cut down emissions from fossil fuels. Should we not do far more to encourage all future power stations to be nuclear power stations?

Mr. Parkinson: Unlike the French and the Japanese, we have substantial reserves of coal, and it would be a mistake for the nation to turn its back on them. We have coal, oil, gas, and nuclear, too. It is right to maintain our nuclear component at its present level. Many of my hon. Friend's constituents work in the nuclear industry. I am sure that he will not fail to point out to them that no other party in the House supports nuclear power.

Ms. Armstrong: Will the Minister acknowledge that the equation is not quite as simple as that which was put to the House by the hon. Member for Dorset, South (Mr. Bruce)? The Government have not yet begun to come to terms with the problem of the disposal of nuclear waste, but, at the same time, we have the technology and the knowledge to control emissions from coal-fired power stations so that they are not an environmental hazard.

Mr. Parkinson: It is not true that the technology for dealing with nuclear waste has not been identified. The reprocessing of spent fuel is now firmly in hand, and the search for a final disposal site is also nearing completion.

No source of energy does not involve clear-up costs. It is estimated that the cost of clearing platforms from the North sea is about £6 billion, about half as much again as the cost of decommissioning Magnox power stations. Every year we dig out 60 million tonnes of dirt to get 90 million tonnes of coal, and we dump the 60 million tonnes of dirt on the surface of Britain. We have subsidence, and 235 million tonnes of carbon dioxide is emitted from power stations. It is mistaken for the hon. Lady to pretend that all other sources of fuel are clean and easy and that coal is absolutely costless.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: When promoting nuclear energy, will my right hon. Friend—who knows my part of the world so well—call to the attention of the Central Electricity Generating Board that, in all proposals to store spent nuclear fuel, safety and not the capital programme or the cash flow of the CEGB should be paramount?

Mr. Parkinson: The answer is yes. I know that my hon. Friend is concerned about the proposals for a dry store at Heysham, and I can tell her that safety will be a prime consideration there.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: Is the Secretary of State aware of the Rocky Mountain Institute report, which says that even a sixfold increase in nuclear power would not have a significant impact on the greenhouse effect? In view of his comment that all forms of energy generation have a cost associated with the environment, why has the right hon. Gentleman continued to cut the budget of the energy efficiency office?

Mr. Parkinson: I am aware of the report, although I have only read about it and have not seen it. I believe that it addresses the wrong question. It asks whether nuclear power or energy efficiency can contribute most to the removal of the greenhouse effect. I believe that the greenhouse effect will be alleviated by a combination of factors—nuclear power, more emphasis on the control of emissions from coal-fired power stations and energy efficiency. The Government are promoting the lot.

Mr. John Garrett: Will the Secretary of State elaborate on his reported speech to the Mid-Norfolk Conservative Association a couple of weeks ago—the newspaper report is headed "Cecil's Energy Jigsaw"—in which he is quoted as saying that electricity production will be less nuclear dominated after privatisation because of his opposition to gigantic nuclear stations?

As for environmental damage, will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that his Department has commissioned absolutely no research into the effects of energy production and policy on air pollution? If that is so, he is hardly entitled to give such glib answers.

Mr. Parkinson: I do not hold myself answerable to the Mid-Norfolk News, or whatever it is. I formed the impression from talking to the young man who was there that it was almost the first time that he had ever heard of nuclear power, and he found great difficulty in spelling it.

As for the environment, my Department seeks to promote a range of diverse sources of energy. We have access to a substantial number of studies. We know, and the hon. Gentleman does not deny, the huge costs involved in clearing up in the coal and electricity industries, in clearing the platforms in the North sea, and in further dealing with the problems of subsidence.

Tranco

7. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what progress has been made on the appointment of board members and the formation of the management team for Tranco.

Mr. Parkinson: I announced the chairman and chief executive designate appointments to the new national grid company which will control the national grid after privatisation on 9 June. Further designate appointments to the board were announced on 8 October. A copy of the press notice announcing these, and designate appointments to the boards of "Big and Little G", is being placed in the Library of the House. Good progress is being made in allocating senior management and staff between the successor companies.

Mr. French: Will my right hon. Friend explain what role he envisages for the board of Tranco and the two generating companies in the period prior to full privatisation?

Mr. Parkinson: The designate boards will be making arrangements to take over the running of the companies after vesting day on 1 January 1990. There are a great many interim preparations to be made and they are being made now; for example, the sub-division of the assets and arrangements to continue research programmes. Work is going on to ensure that there is an easy transition on vesting day.

Coal Imports

8. Mr. Cran: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will take steps to ensure that no import quotas are imposed on foreign coal following the privatisation of the domestic coal industry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Government place no restrictions on imports of coal and have no intention of introducing any. As British Coal continues to improve its efficiency we believe that it will remain the supplier of choice for most purchases.

Mr. Cran: Is my hon. Friend aware that more than 300 jobs in my constituency will be lost by an intensive energy user called Capper Pass? It attributes many reasons to that, including the fact that electricity prices are too high. Does my hon. Friend agree that that should not recur with the privatisation of coal and electricity because of the downward effect on prices which those events will have?

Mr. Spicer: I certainly agree that under a privatised electricity industry the pressure on costs through competition will make prices lower than under a nationalised industry. It has always been the Government's position that a privatised electricity industry could buy its coal in the best market. As I have said, we are confident that with the continued efficiency improvements in British Coal,, it will be the supplier of first choice.

Mr. Barron: If coal imports increase and threaten indigenous production, will the Government take action to ensure that our national interests are always looked after?

Mr. Spicer: What are the national interests? The hon. Gentleman will surely know that a reason why there has been a marginal increase in coal imports—to nearly 10 per cent.—is that under this Government we have had a successful steel industry which has been importing large amounts of coking coal, which this country cannot supply. Therefore, let us consider exactly what is the national interest.

Mr. Oppenheim: Is it not about time that British Coal lost its virtual monopoly of coal reserves? Surely it is not healthy for a big centralised organisation to have a monopoly, as British Coal does, especially when it comes to the opencast sector, where British Coal insists on operating only large, environmentally damaging, opencast sites rather than smaller, more environmentally sensitive ones?

Mr. Spicer: As my right hon. Friend said, the whole question of licensing rights and the ownership of reserves is a central matter to be addressed when we come to privatise the industry.

Energy Conservation

9. Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what conclusions he has drawn from the energy conservation schemes in Leicester; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Department of Energy (Mr. Peter Morrison): I understand that the Leicester local energy action campaign has achieved a number of successes. My right hon. Friend looks forward to receiving the final report on the campaign, which I understand is due to be issued by the end of the year.

Mr. Vaz: Will the Minister join me in congratulating Leicester city council and the energy consortium there on the success of the scheme? Will he assure the House that his plans for privatisation will not in any way affect the success of the scheme? In particular, will he confirm that area boards will be entitled to have the freedom to conclude contracts with the consortia, irrespective of the privatisation plans?

Mr. Morrison: I am delighted to agree with the hon. Gentleman about the local initiative in Leicester and to say that such initiatives have also been taken in other cities. On the second part of his question, I can confirm that that will be the case.

Departmental Offices

10. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what will be the total annual cost of his Department's new offices.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The total annual cost to be charged to my Department by the Property Services Agency under the property repayment service is currently estimated at £9·45 million, although the rent paid by the PSA, and hence the actual annual cost to the taxpayer, will be substantially less.

Mr. Smith: Has the Department of Energy not been so successful with its policies, first by privatising gas, now by privatising electricity and soon by privatising coal, that it has effectively done itself out of a job? In those circumstances, would it not be better advised, rather than hiring expensive new offices, to set a time when no offices will be needed?

Mr. Morrison: I am delighted to accept my hon. Friend's congratulations on the Department's success. We still have to get through the Bill to privatise electricity and, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State explained, coal is for the next Parliament, too. We shall need the odd office from which to organise that. In case my hon. Friend has not seen the figures, may I tell him that in 1986 we had 300,000 sq feet. Today we have 245,000 sq feet, and when we move to our new premises next year the figure will be reduced to 184,000 sq feet. It will have been nearly halved in four years.

Mr. Win Griffiths: What measures will be taken in the new offices to conserve energy? Does the Minister agree that if the Government spent more money on conserving energy instead of on promoting power stations such as Hinkley C we would need no more new power stations for a decade?

Mr. Morrison: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we have taken measures to improve the conservation and use of lighting and heating. Initiatives in that direction have been taken across Whitehall.

Coal Production

11. Mr. Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many kilojoules per man hour were produced by British Coal in (a) 1979 and (b) the last 12 months for which figures are available; and if he will express the latter as a percentage of the former.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Productivity rose from 2·24 tonnes per manshift in 1978-79 to 3·62 tonnes in 1987-88, an increase of 62 per cent. Productivity figures based on heat content are not available.

Mr. Lawrence: The House will wish to congratulate the miners and British Coal on achieving those remarkable productivity figures under a Conservative Government. Can my hon. Friend give comparable figures for productivity when the Labour party had control of the coal industry?

Mr. Spicer: I could give the House those figures, but it would be rather boring if I did. During the Labour Government productivity in the coal industry fell every year that they were in office.

Mr. Flynn: What does the Minister believe will be the effect on coal consumption of today's news of the collapse of the first serious bid to generate electricity privately under the Energy Act 1983? Will he investigate why his Department encouraged the doomed plan to reopen Rogerstone power station by backing Mr. Angelo Casfikis when there was abundant evidence then, as now, that he is a man of straw? Will the Department promise not to support dotty schemes to reopen clapped-out power stations in the face of the united opposition of local people and councils?

Mr. Spicer: The Government's policy is to encourage as much competition in the generation of electricity as possible, and the thrust of the proposals that we shall place before Parliament during the next few months will be precisely to that effect. The Government have no control over who makes applications; nor do we wish to have any. But we do wish to encourage all-comers to apply on their merits for rights to produce electricity.

Electricity Industry

12. Mr. Brandon-Bravo: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many proposed private schemes he is aware of in connection with the proposed privatisation of the electricity supply industry; and what percentage of the present electricity output these represent.

Mr. Parkinson: I am aware of some 15 private generation proposals. If all came to fruition, they would amount to 8 per cent. of the total electricity needs of England and Wales.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: As the White Paper was published barely six months ago, is my right hon. Friend encouraged by such interest at this early stage? Does that not represent a serious input of competition? More important, will he give the House every assurance that the new private generation schemes will have easy access to the national grid?

Mr. Parkinson: Yes. Private generators will have access as of right to the grid, although they will have to pay a fee to use the service. I hear some sniggering remarks from the Opposition, but may I tell them that those 15 proposals come from some of the finest companies in Britain and in the world.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: How many of those proposals involve the use of gas to generate electricity? I notice that the Fawley B application has been withdrawn, and there is increasing talk of gas being used to generate electricity in many small schemes after privatisation. Does the Minister agree that that would be an absurd use of gas? Using gas to generate electricity is less than 50 per cent. efficient, whereas using it for heating in homes and industry is almost 100 per cent. efficient. Does the Minister agree that it is absurd in relation to the greenhouse effect?

Mr. Parkinson: Three or four of those applications involve the use of gas. Gas-fired stations can be produced quickly—within two years—they are extremely flexible and many people believe that the shortage of those facilities has been a disadvantage to the electricity supply industry in the past. That will be remedied.

13. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what recent representations he has received about his plans for privatisation of the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I continue to receive representations on electricity privatisation. It is clear from my discussions with many interest groups that there is a large body of support for our proposals.

Mr. Thurnham: Does my hon. Friend agree that after privatisation decision-making should be better than it has sometimes been? Was it not the last Labour Government who ordered the Drax power station without gas scrubbers because they could not face telling Arthur Scargill the true cost of burning coal?

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend makes an excellent point. There is no question but that this Government have led the field in insisting that the electricity supply industry starts to clean up emissions. There are now plans for £1·5 billion worth of pollution control plant that would not have been conceived of by the Labour Government.

THE ARTS

Leicester

48. Mr. Janner: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he next proposes to visit the city of Leicester to discuss the effects of Government arts policy there.

The Minister for the Arts (Mr. Richard Luce): I have no immediate plans to visit Leicester, which I last visited on 8 September this year.

Mr. Janner: Is the Minister aware that Leicester city council applied for additional funding for five workers for its arts action project in accordance with the Minister's own pronouncements that arts are important for inner city regeneration? Is he aware that the Secretary of State for the Environment saw fit to turn down that application and would not allow one additional person? He said that he did not consider the funding of arts promotion activities to be a priority for regeneration resources. Is the Secretary of State trying to sabotage the Arts Minister's efforts to help?

Mr. Luce: The hon. Gentleman should pursue that point with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. In the past few weeks there has been a great deal of interest in the role that arts and heritage can play in the regeneration of inner cities. It is because of that that three useful seminars have been held, in Glasgow, Kent and Halifax. All those were based on practical evidence on the ground that arts and heritage play a leading part in the regeneration process, but it must be up to the local authorities and the Government to decide whether certain projects fall within the required criteria.

Endowment Funding

49. Mr. Butler: To ask the Minister for the Arts if he will make it his policy to move towards selective endowment funding of arts and heritage bodies.

Mr. Luce: I am very much in favour of arts bodies building up endowment funds. Apart from the special case of the National Heritage Memorial Fund, however, such funds should be drawn from private sector resources.

Mr. Butler: Will my hon. Friend reconsider this and, perhaps, experiment with launching out on endowment some of the smaller museums currently funded by his Office?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his point. There is no doubt that the establishment of endowment funds in the arts helps to strengthen the security and independence of arts bodies. I am very much in favour of the expansion of those endowment funds. They have tended to happen with the larger bodies. The most recent example is the National Theatre, which has established a £1·5 million endowment fund, under the leadership of the outstanding retiring chairman, Lord Rayne. With the range of tax concessions already available, people should be encouraged to establish endowment funds.

Libraries (Green Paper)

50. Ms. Walley: To ask the Minister for the Arts how many representations from (a) library authorities and (b) members of the general public he received on the Green Paper on "Libraries".

Mr. Luce: I have received representations from 103 library authorities and about 7,000 from organisations and individuals.

Ms. Walley: I thank the Minister for his reply. Will he tell us how many in each of those two categories are in favour of, or are against, the proposals in the Green Paper? Judging from the response in my constituency, many members of the public, professional organisations and county councils are against proposals to put those services out to private contractors. In the light of that, is the Minister carrying out proper consultation?

Mr. Luce: I do not think that there could have been a more extensive consultation than the one we have had on the Green Paper on Libraries. For that reason I welcome the large number of representations that have been made to me, which we are presently studying. In due course I shall make a statement on them. Varied views have been expressed and I found that, as time went on, there was a greater understanding of what I was trying to achieve—to help the library services to improve themselves still further and to get better value for money. Sub-contracting is worthwhile only if one gets better value for money or an improved service. I believe that that makes absolute sense.

Mr. Robert B. Jones: Is my right hon. Friend aware of how many of the people who sent in representations on the Green Paper had read that paper rather than having a simple interpretation of it given to them by a union or other vested party? Those of my constituents to whom I sent a copy of the Green Paper and who wrote to the Department had different views about it after they had studied the proposals in context.

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. It often happens that when a Government publish a Green Paper it is misinterpreted, sometimes deliberately. I believe that that partly happened in this case, and I believe also that a large number of people—not everyone—have misinterpreted it. Those people have done themselves, as well as the library service, a disservice.

Mr. Fisher: Will the Minister answer the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) and say how many people who submitted answers to the Green Paper rejected the Government's proposals in that document? Is it not the case that the vast majority of people who replied to that Green Paper said no to the premium book scheme, no to privatising branch libraries, no to privatising the loan of education videos and no to privatising the library services to old people's homes?

Does the Minister not understand that such proposals undermine the public service aspect of public libraries and must be rejected?

Mr. Luce: The majority of those who replied were more sensible than that. They did not give a yes or no to the Green Paper, but they saw that it contained a range of sensible suggestions. Those people put forward their constructive ideas about the proposals, some of which they were in favour of and some of which they had doubts about. That is what a Green Paper discussion should be all about.

Joint Stock Theatre Company

51. Mr. Sedgemore: To ask the Minister for the Arts when he last saw a performance of the Joint Stock Theatre Company.

Mr. Luce: I have not been able to see a performance by the Joint Stock Theatre Company.

Mr. Sedgemore: Oh. Will the Minister confirm that anyone who has not seen a performance by this company is an appalling philistine? Will he also confirm that the switch in Arts Council funding for this company from revenue to project status is based on nothing more than ideological spite and dislike for the radical, cutting edge of the superb performances of this wonderful company, about which nothing bad could ever be said?

Mr. Luce: It is nice to see the hon. Gentleman showing such enthusiasm for Joint Stock Theatre Company, and I welcome that. At the end of the day it is for the Arts Council to make a judgment on the grounds of artistic merit as to whether an arts organisation should be supported. As I understand it, the Joint Stock Theatre Company is eligible for project funding, and it is open to it to make an application to the Arts Council.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Government have a good record, which compares favourably with that of previous Governments, on supporting touring companies? That support is right because those companies bring the arts closer to people.

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. It is worth noting that I have earmarked additional sums to the tune of £1·5 million this year for the additional touring activities of major arts bodies. As a result, we have had the evidence of increased touring by theatres, orchestras and opera companies. That is to the benefit of all our people.

Museums and Galleries

53. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister for the Arts what information he has as to the current level of attendance at museums and galleries.

Mr. Luce: The number of visitors to museums and galleries has increased strongly in recent years, rising from 68 million visitors in 1985 to 73 million in 1986. The Museums Association estimates that visitor numbers could top 100 million during Museums Year 1989, when the association will celebrate its centenary.

Mr. Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend convey my congratulations and the congratulations of all hon. Members to those concerned with those figures? The much improved attendances at museums and galleries are further evidenced by the enormous growth in private, municipal and independent museums and galleries. Is that not a tribute to the improvement in and provision of education that we have had under this Government?

Mr. Luce: I entirely agree with what my hon. Friend has said—the proof of the pudding is in the eating, and the number of people attending those museums all over the country represents a remarkable expansion. We are still seeing the opening of a new museum on average once every fortnight, which is testimony to the public interest in and increasing demand for museums and galleries.

Mr. Buchan: Does not that interest make all the more serious what happens when charges are imposed in our museums? The Minister is ignoring the point that, on average, there has been a drop in attendance of around 40 per cent. in the first year, which sometimes continues, in all the institutions that he has allowed or encouraged to charge. Is that not more reactionary than the position before Victorian philanthropy?

Mr. Luce: It is entirely up to the trustees of bodies to decide whether to make charges and, if so, in what way. When they make charges, one of the most noticeable things is that they have a range of concessions for certain people, whether schools, residents and so on, to enable them to have access to the museum at concessionary prices. It is also interesting that a number of them are ensuring that their museum remains open without charge at certain hours, although there are charges for the rest of the day. That is another concession. Above all else, the biggest test is whether charging leads to improvements of the museum's services which, in turn, benefit the public, and there is plenty of evidence of that.

CIVIL SERVICE

Party Conferences (Duties)

68. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what guidance is given to civil servants with regard to their duties and responsibilities relating to attendance on official business at party conferences.

The Minister of State, Privy Council Office (Mr. Richard Luce): It is an established principle that civil servants should not engage in activities likely to call into question their political impartiality.

Mr. Banks: May I tell the Minister that that is a thoroughly unsatisfactory and complacent reply, given the way in which the Government have blurred the distinction between Civil Service and party political activity, the most blatant example being the party political use of press officers? Will the Minister assure the House either that he will give instructions to Ministers not to use civil servants in the party political way that they do, particularly in respect of attendance at the Conservative party conference, or that he will come to the House and make proposals for a politicised Civil Service, honestly done, on a spoils system, because that is what we are going towards?

Mr. Luce: I do not know what the hon. Gentleman is getting at when he refers to attendance at the Conservative party conference. If he has an allegation to make against a particular Department or Secretary of State, he should make it directly and substantiate such charges. There are clearly laid down rules and a copy of the establishments officer's guide is available in the Library and can be referred to. It is up to my right hon. Friends to stick to those rules.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the instructions and guidelines to civil servants include the fact that they should not steal documents and send them to the Labour party?

Mr. Luce: My hon. Friend makes a point. It is remarkable for the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) to suggest that rules are being transgressed, for example, at the Conservative party conference, without substantiating his allegations.

Agencies

69. Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what progress has been made in the last four months in the establishment of Government agencies under the Civil Service reforms.

70. Mr. Tim Smith: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service how many executive agencies have beeen established.

Mr. Luce: Two executive agencies, the Vehicle Inspectorate and Companies House, have been established so far. A further 30 candidates are under consideration.

Mr. Wilshire: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. Does he now have more activities to add to the list that he announced on 25 July? What specific arrangements are being made for each agency to ensure that there is strong public accountability and a business management ethos?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's interest. I have undertaken to give a progress report to the House every six months or so on the establishment of agencies. As I said, we now have the two first agencies—the Vehicle Inspectorate and Companies House. I expect the Department of Health and Social Security resettlement units and the employment service to be early candidates for the creation of agencies. Since I last spoke in the House, there are three new candidates—the Land Registry, the Building Research Establishment and the Crown Suppliers' fuel business.

The Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service has made its views known to us about accountability. The established traditions of accountability and ministerial responsibility to the House remain, and the methods for achieving that are being looked at as a result of the views of the Committee. The Government will reply to them shortly.

Mr. Smith: On that last point, may I reinforce what the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service said about accountability. Does my right hon. Friend agree that if we give the chief executive of an agency the responsibility of running it, he, not a permanent secretary at the Department, should be the accounting officer? I hope that my right hon. Friend will be able to respond positively to the recommendations made by the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee.

Mr. Luce: I take careful note of my hon. Friend's comments. As he says, that was one of the points made by the Select Committee and I assure him that we shall take that aspect on board.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I believe that the Minister's answers today are of some historic importance, and only time will tell why. Will he give an absolute assurance that the creation of the agencies will in no way undermine the accountability of Departments or Ministers to Members of Parliament and to Parliament?

Mr. Luce: I give an absolute assurance to the hon. Gentleman that it will not, in any way. I believe that it will actually strengthen the system of accountability. At the end of the day Ministers are directly accountable to the House.

Mr. Cryer: Is not experience with the establishment of private agencies that Ministers who seek to evade responsibility will always be able to refer questions to that particular agency? That happens now with organisations in the public sector, such as the Central Electricity Generating Board. All the assurances are so much hollow nonsense, because hiving off means that the Table Office will not accept parliamentary questions, the Minister can evade them and there is a severe diminution in public accountability to the House.

Mr. Luce: I disagree. The principle of delegated authority to civil servants to carry on their responsibilities and have some budget control will lead to better management and to decision-making within the Civil Service of an even higher standard than at present. The principle is right. At the same time, the principle of ministerial accountability to the House remains absolutely firm. At the end of the day the Minister in charge, the political head of the Department, will be accountable to the House of Commons.

Secondments

71. Mr. Butler: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service what targets he has set for secondments into and out of the Civil Service.

Mr. Luce: I no longer set central targets for secondments. That is now a matter for individual Departments, which will be implementing new programmes for interchange with business over the next few years. I hope that their effect will be to enhance significantly the overall number of secondments between the Civil Service and other organisations.

Mr. Butler: Does my right hon. Friend agree that civil servants would benefit from some experience of the problems of small businesses? Will he encourage secondments to small businesses for civil servants?

Mr. Luce: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his interest in this matter. Without any shadow of a doubt, I can say yes, we shall try to encourage greater secondment to small businesses. I am also trying to encourage secondment from regional and local offices, aimed particularly at smaller businesses. In that way we can help. The recent White Paper, "Releasing Enterprise" gives particular emphasis to that.

Unions (Meetings)

72. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service when he last met the leaders of Civil Service unions; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Luce: I have meetings from time to time with representatives of Civil Service trade unions both centrally and during visits to Civil Service establishments. A wide variety of matters are raised.

Mr. Winnick: Are we to understand that the Prime Minister's statement in Poland about basic human rights means that trade unionists at GCHQ will no longer be victimised because they want to exercise their basic human rights in this country? As the word "hypocrisy" is not allowed here, how else can the Minister explain the difference between what the Prime Minister says in Poland and what the Government do in this country?

Mr. Luce: I am astonished that the hon. Gentleman can seek to draw a parallel between what is happening in Poland today and what is happening in this country. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister paid a highly successful visit to Poland and the hon. Gentleman should be proud of the fact that my right hon. Friend carries such authority abroad. As for the hon. Gentleman's comparison, does he not understand the difference between Poland and true democracy, with freedom under the law and a freely elected Parliament? If he does not understand that, he does not understand anything.

Mr. Hind: In his discussions with Civil Service trade unions about executive agencies, will my right hon. Friend consider locating many of these new executive agencies in the provinces in areas of high unemployment? Will he also pursuade the trade unions to agree to that course of action?

Mr. Luce: My right hon. Friend the Paymaster General has answered questions on this subject in the House. The Government are actively setting the right environment in which it is possible for Departments to take decisions about whether to be inside London or in another part of the country. Four out of five civil servants are now outside London, but they need to consider carefully, sensibly and ruthlessly, whether there are advantages in moving to another part of the country.

Dr. Marek: Does the Minister accept that on more than one occasion trade unions in GCHQ offered a no-strike deal to the Government? Will he confirm that the Government did not respond to those offers and decided to ban the right of free association? What explanation can there be for today's action by many thousands of trade unionists other than a firm rebuttal of the Prime Minister's pathological hatred of British trade unionists and her belief that trade unionists throughout the country are the enemy within?

Mr. Luce: It surprises me that the hon. Gentleman has not yet accepted that national security has to come first and that GCHQ needs to operate continuously if it is to be effective. Between 1979 and 1981, 10,000 working days were lost. As a result of that, the effectiveness of GCHQ was jeopardised. That is the heart of the matter.

Pensioners (Benefits)

3.31 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn) (by private notice): To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on his intention to introduce further means-tested benefits for pensioners.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Nigel Lawson): Mr. Speaker, I have no such intentions except in one respect. I have been discussing with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security a scheme to give special help to poorer pensioners. This would be over and above the existing level of benefits. We shall announce the outcome of this consideration in due course.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Chancellor accept that his briefing on Friday and his statement that produced widespread concern among pensioners and the general public? Does not the Chancellor recognise that the people in "difficulty", far from being "a small minority" as he claims, are, on the Government's own figures, the 3 million people who are on or below income support level, and the 3 million more who are just above that low level? Will he not accept, once and for all, that pensions are not an act of charity to an older generation; they are a right that retired people have earned in a lifetime of contributions.

"only a small minority of pensioners have difficulty in making ends meet"

Since the Chancellor is such an advocate of targeting, will he now acknowledge that such a policy inevitably brings a more means-tested system and creates a wider poverty trap? Can he also tell us why it is that, when he targets handouts to the better-off, his aim is unerringly accurate, but when he targets benefits to the poor he always misses many of those in genuine need? [HON. MEMBERS: "No!"] It is the Chancellor's fault for talking to the press. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kinnock: Had the public not been misled on so many occasions over SERPS, child benefit and housing benefit, it might be more possible to believe what the Chancellor has been saying in denying his own words. Will he now specifically confirm that the Government will not, now or at any other time, means-test—[Interruption.] This is vital to 9 million people in this country. Will the Chancellor confirm that the Government will not, now or at any other time, means-test or reduce the national insurance pension? Will he pledge that the Government will not withdraw, reduce, or means-test the right of all old-age pensioners to free prescriptions?

Will he give an undertaking now that the Government will not introduce any new charges? As the mobility and attendance allowances are not covered, although they are vital to 3 million people—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a matter of great interest.

Mr. Kinnock: As the mobility and attendance allowances are not covered by the Government pledge to annual uprating, will the Chancellor now give assurances that he will maintain the value of those and will not subject the right to receive them to any form of means test? If the Chancellor wants us and the country to believe that all the reports over the weekend are nothing more than what he called "the fevered imagination of the press",

why does he not prove his commitment to pensioners by scrapping the policy of charging 6·5 million pensioners for eye tests, and scrap them now?

Mr. Lawson: Mr. Speaker, that was an extraordinarily long series of supplementary questions—[Interruption]—designed simply to conceal the fact that the right hon. Gentleman has once again demonstrated his infallible knack for getting the wrong end of every stick. The Government—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Opposition has asked some questions and it is right and fair that the Chancellor should have an opportunity to answer them.

Mr. Lawson: The Government's position on social security benefits remains today exactly as it has always been. It remains today precisely what it is, including the pledge to maintain the retirement pension in real terms. We have uprated the retirement pension consistently in line with inflation, despite the fact that there are 1·25 million more old-age pensioners today, and despite the fact that the Labour Government, which the right hon. Gentleman supported, although he was not a member of it, that the Labour Government cheated the old-age pensioners. They cheated the old-age pensioner twice. On two occasions, they withdrew the Christmas bonus. They changed the uprating system from the historic uprating to the so-called forecast, cheating them of £1 billion. [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer the question!"] Then they fiddled the forecast—that is what they did—[Interruption]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This shouting does not enhance the reputation of this place.

Mr. Lawson: The only change which I have been discussing, and my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary has been discussing, with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, is a scheme to improve the benefits received by poorer pensioners. We have done that because pensioners as a whole have seen their real living standard, their real incomes, rise since we took office by over 20 per cent. When the party opposite were in office, they rose by only 3 per cent. That is what has happened, but there are some pensioners who are less well off and we are seeking a way to help them.

Dame Jill Knight (Birmingham, Edgbaston): We are most grateful to my right hon. Friend for the statement that he has just made and for clearing up what most of us thought—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Dame Jill Knight: —was gross misreporting of the situation at the weekend, thereby making it clear that there is indeed no threat whatsoever to contributory pensions. Will my right hon. Friend note that many of us feel that it is unjust to make non-contributory pensions and handouts to those who can perfectly well afford to do without, bearing in mind that it is the poorer taxpayers who have to foot the bill?

Mr. Lawson: On the second point, my hon. Friend makes an important point, which I think has considerable support on this side of the House. On the first point, I am afraid that it is true that the standards of the press have slipped somewhat since I—[Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind hon. Members that we have a very full day ahead of us. I call the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Lawson: —since I ceased to be a member of it. However, I am therefore grateful to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition—the first Leader of the Opposition for 34 years to ask a private notice question of a departmental Minister—for giving me the opportunity to make this statement today.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): How on earth did the Chancellor, as a former journalist, manage to mislead so many journalists at once about his intentions? Does he not realise that the message that is coming across to a great many people is that, if they save for their retirement or have an occupational pension, however small, they will lose benefits, as they have already lost housing benefit, home insulation grants and other benefits? If that message continues to come across, the savings ratio will become even worse than it is now.

Mr. Lawson: The hon. Member has raised an important point. That is a consideration. I hope that there can be a little bit more quiet from the Benches opposite even though I know they have been badly wrong-footed and badly misled by the Leader of the Opposition, as usual.

The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. One could argue that nothing extra should be done to assist these poorer pensioners at all because that would be a disincentive for them to save. One could take that view. It may be the view of the Liberal party, or whatever it is nowadays called, but it is not the view of the Government.

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): The Leader of the Opposition referred to the right of pensioners to have a pension. Will my right hon. Friend the Chancellor reiterate that under the previous Labour Government, which the right hon. Gentleman supported, pensioners came off very badly indeed, compared with their position since 1979? As the Government are trustees of the taxpayers' money, does my right hon. Friend agree that it is right that that money should go to people in real need, rather than across the board? It is a fallacy to think that all retired pensioners are on the poverty line. Many pensioners can afford to pay the charges and live in very good circumstances.

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend is correct. I will repeat what I said earlier on. I am not surprised that, because of the noise and baying from the Benches opposite, it was difficult for my hon. Friend to hear it. When the party opposite were in office—[HON. MEMBERS: "Come off it."] They do not like it, but they have got to listen to it—the real incomes of old-age pensioners rose by only 3 per cent. During the period that we have been in office so far, the real income of the average pensioner has risen by well over 20 per cent.

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): May I thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the judicious way in which he waved a fig leaf this afternoon, in his statement about the concessions for some old-age pensioners? Does not he agree that the House is being extremely unfair in its response so far, in that the briefings he gave at the weekend follow logically from the statement that we heard recently on the freezing of child benefit? If it is proper to target help on families in need, is it not also proper for the Government to target help on other groups? Are not the pensions for 7 million pensioners, the payments to half a million widows, the disability pensions drawn by well over 1 million people and the 700,000 payments to the unemployed at stake if the Government really mean to target benefits? I have been a Member of the House since 1979. We in the Labour party have rarely got our teeth near an election winner. We have one today and we do not intend to take them out.

Mr. Lawson: I have considerable respect for the hon. Member, but what I have no respect for is his attempt to terrify millions of old-age pensioners—[Interruption.] It is a disgraceful way to try to seek temporary political advantage—a disgraceful way. Let me say that the only announcement I have to make—the only change I have to inform the House of—is the one that I informed the House of today. This is a matter which I hinted to certain journalists on Friday. They misunderstood what I was saying—[Laughter.] There is no—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This kind of laughter and these interruptions take up a great deal of time. Many hon. Members want to ask questions about this matter.

Mr. Lawson: —and as a result went in for a farrago of invention but that is no reason for the hon. Member to take it out. What I have to say is this matter is a serious matter. This matter is a serious matter. This matter was discussed by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security during this year's public expenditure round but we were not, during that round, in a position to have a worked-out scheme. We were not in this round in a position to put the scheme in place but in due course we shall do so and this is good news for the pensioners and I hope the whole House will welcome it.

Sir Barney Hayhoe (Brentford and Isleworth): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement this afternoon, the assurance within it and the assurances that he gave this morning in his interview on Radio 4, will be widely welcomed? However, can he explain why these assurances were not given at least 24 hours earlier?

Mr. Lawson: I think perhaps I may ask my right hon. Friend why he did not try to ascertain the facts of the matter before he made the statement that he did to the media.

Mrs. Audrey Wise (Preston): Will the Chancellor accept our sympathy for his evident inability to make himself understood? Will he accept that his problems would be eased if he in turn realised that what pensioners want are better universal benefits and, if some of those benefits go to those who are rather better off, they will be recouped when those self-same people pay their taxes?

Mr. Lawson: We have maintained the value of the state retirement pension despite the fact that there are a million and a quarter more pensioners—maintained that in real terms as we had pledged we would do and we will continue to do so. That is firm; that is clear. What is also clear is that as a result of SERPS, someone now retiring gets on SERPS an extra £25 a week, whereas in 1979 it was an extra £1 a week. That is, as I say, an extra £25 a week in SERPS. Many more people now have occupational pensions. Many more pensioners now have savings. Unlike with the Labour Government when inflation robbed them of the value of their savings, they are now getting a real return on their savings. So that is why pensioners as a whole have had their incomes rising faster than that of the rest of the community. But there still remains a problem—[AN HON. MEMBER: "You."]—as all of us on this side of the House know. There still remains a problem of a minority of pensioners who have done far worse. That minority is the minority we propose to address with the new scheme which I told the House about a few moments ago.

Mr. Andrew Bowden (Brighton, Kemptown): Does my right hon. Friend accept that up to 30 per cent. of pensioners live at an unacceptably low standard of living? Does he also agree that another 30 per cent. of pensioners have a very reasonable standard of living? Surely it is quite illogical to give a £10 Christmas bonus to the top 30 per cent. instead of giving a £20 Christmas bonus to the bottom 30 per cent. Let us use the money wisely.

Mr. Lawson: I know of my hon. Friend's concern over many, many years for the pensioners and he has been consistent in that, but I have to say I have no change to announce whatever in the payment of the Christmas bonus. We will continue to pay it; indeed, we have put it on a statutory basis, unlike the Labour Government who, two years out of five they were in office, failed to pay it at all.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): As the Chancellor of the Exchequer has somewhat ungallantly attributed all his difficulties to members of the press, will he tell us which were the offending newspapers and whether he intends to invite their representatives to come round and see him again?

Mr. Lawson: The journalists concerned—the journalists concerned know very well if they—and if they look in their notebooks—and they were taking notes—they will see that what—the stories that appeared in the Sunday press bear no relation whatever to what I said.

Mr. Ray Whitney (Wycombe): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the splutterings of the Leader of the Opposition, which were so ill-judged and appeared to be so synthetic, may have been a genuine cry of rage? Does he further agree that all the new and positive thinking on social and other issues come from this Government and from the Conservative party and that there is no new thinking on the part of the Labour party and the other Opposition parties? Last week, the Opposition affected to be outraged by the suggestion that our hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State responsible for higher education was seeking new funds to ensure that a greater proportion of young people would benefit from higher education. They are now outraged that my right hon. Friend is seeking to find new resources for the lower-income sections of the elderly population.

Mr. Lawson: I think my hon. Friend is right, that the Leader of the Opposition did make, as usual, a complete mess of it and I think that was why his predecessor a moment ago tried to help him.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer accept that his arrogant statement today can hardly be interpreted as a consolation to those pensioners who have spent a sleepless night worrying about what will happen? Instead of filling the country with despair and poverty, will he, as an apology, give a commitment that the Government will look carefully at the King's Fund report which shows that British pensioners in general—not a tiny majority—are among the poorest in the world with the lowest life expectancy?

Mr. Lawson: As I pointed out earlier, during the time that we have been in office, the average—the income of the —the real income—the real income, that is, after allowing for inflation—the real income of the average pensioner has risen by well over 20 per cent., over 23 per cent., in fact. It was 23 per cent. by 1986 and it is higher today. That is above the average level of increase for the population as a whole.

Mr. Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar): Although the targeting of benefits clearly makes a great deal of sense, especially when it is accompanied by additional resources, as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has just stated, will he perhaps try to avoid assuming in any future comments that he makes on these matters, that pensioners are either very well-off or on the poverty line, forgetting the large number in the middle to whom, for example, the withdrawal of free prescriptions would be a considerable setback? May I suggest to him that, if his statements over the weekend indicate the beginning of a debate on how targeting and its machinery should be implemented, his comments to the press on Friday will not have been in vain.

Mr. Lawson: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. In fact, the statements, as I said—the statements that appeared in the press on Sunday bore no relation whatever to what I in fact said. What I have said to them is that, while we were absolutely, totally committed to maintaining——

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): They will have the shorthand notes.

Mr. Lawson: Oh yes, they will have their shorthand notes and they will know it, and they will know they went behind afterwards and they thought there was not a good enough story and so they produced that. They will know that I said that, while the state pension would continue to be uprated in line with inflation, as we have always said it would, that additional help over and above that ought, in my judgment, to be concentrated on those who are at the poorest end, of pensioners, whose incomes have not risen nearly as fast as the generality of pensioners.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): As all the Sunday newspapers carried virtually the same story, is the Chancellor saying that every journalist who came to the briefing—he has not denied that there was one—misunderstood what he said and that if the choice is between believing what all the newspapers said or what the Chancellor has said today we should somehow believe the Chancellor?

Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer appreciate, however, that he is to be congratulated—and I, as a member of the Opposition, congratulate him—on revealing the Tories' intentions on the hidden agenda and making it clear that millions of pensioners should indeed be terrified of what would happen if the Tories were re-elected?

Mr. Lawson: It is quite clear that the less salubrious hon. Members opposite, of which the hon. Member who just spoke is a conspicuous example—[HON. MEMBERS: "Withdraw!"]—are determined to run a scare campaign. In fact, the people of this country will judge this Government by their record and not by the scare campaigns of the party opposite. We saw them before the last election and we remember the result of the last election.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend totally disregard the nonsense talked by Labour Members, whose record on inflation, the elderly, the winter of discontent and the Christmas bonuses was utterly disgraceful? In view of the dangers of misreporting to which my right hon. Friend referred, however, would it not be a good idea to refrain from gabbing to the press until policies are clearly agreed and defined?

Mr. Lawson: My hon. Friend of course was once a Minister himself and therefore he speaks with great authority, but he will recall that it is customary for Ministers to talk to the press on an off-the-record basis from time to time.

Mr. Speaker: Statement—Mr. Hurd.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the Chancellor of the Exchequer to refer to any right hon. or hon. Member as "less salubrious"?

Mr. Speaker: I have heard worse.

Mr. Winnick: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It will take up time and I have already called the hon. Gentleman once.

Mr. Winnick: I am sometimes criticised by my colleagues for the fact that I rarely drink. Should not the Chancellor apologise for his slur? It should make no difference whether a slur comes from the Chancellor or from anyone else. Why can he not apologise?

Hon. Members: Bring him back!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that the word "salubrious" has anything to do with drink.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I ask why on some occasions, on issues not quite so important as this, you allow questions to go on for three quarters of an hour but on this fundamental issue for the mass of ordinary people in this country you bring questions to a close in less than half an hour? I should like an answer from you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will give the hon. Gentleman the answer. He well knows that there is a difference between a private notice question, which normally goes on for about 15 minutes—this one went on for 25 minutes—and a statement. This was a private notice question and not a statement.

Mr. Heffer: So what?

Mr. Speaker: Just that!

Broadcasting (White Paper)

3.58 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about the Government's plans for broadcasting legislation. I have laid a White Paper before the House today.

Our broadcasting system has a rich heritage, which is a tribute to the efforts and enterprise of the broadcasting authorities and all those professionally engaged in the broadcasting enterprise. Our proposals seek to build on those achievements in developing services of quality, range and popularity.

Broadcasting is changing fast and this change makes possible a much wider choice for the viewer and the listener. The viewer should not be denied this choice. That is our starting point. The Government should not seek to lay down a blueprint for the future by picking favoured technologies. Rather, we propose an enabling framework with increased opportunities for additional channels as the customer determines. Several dozen television channels and possibly several hundred radio services may be in prospect.

Subscription, which enables the viewer to signal his preference to the broadcaster directly, will have a greater role to play. There will be a greater separation of the different activities that make up broadcasting, including programme production, the assembly of individual programmes into channels and transmission and service delivery.

The ownership of commercial television and radio should be widely spread. The White Paper contains detailed proposals to ensure that the control of television and radio services is not concentrated in the hands of a few groups or individuals and to prevent excessive media cross-ownership. The Government are determined to keep the market open to newcomers and to prevent any tendency towards editorial uniformity.

Safeguards on minimum standards are needed to protect viewers and listeners from shoddy wares and exploitation. Subject to those, they should be able to exercise greater choice over what they hear and see. While some important positive programming obligations are retained, we envisage a substantial liberalisation, especially of the ITV system, and greater reliance on the viewer, rather than the regulator, to sustain range and quality.

Those are the principles that have guided us. Our thinking has been influenced at many points by the Peacock report and by the admirable report in June of the Home Affairs Committee of this House. I hope that right hon. and hon. Members will find the time to read the White Paper in full, but I shall give a brief outline of the main practical proposals.

We propose that a new fifth channel, with 65 to 70 per cent. national coverage, should be authorised to begin broadcasting at the start of 1993. Different companies could provide the services at different times of the day, but the channel would be nationally based. A sixth channel will also be authorised if technical studies show it to be feasible.

We propose a new flexible framework for the development of multi-channel local services through both cable and microwave transmission, known as MVDS. That will make possible a further extension of viewer choice. It will also provide new opportunities for local television in cities and for television services catering for minority interests.

British Satellite Broadcasting plans to start its three channel direct broadcasting by satellite—DBS—service next autumn. The Government gave BSB an undertaking last year that the United Kingdom's fourth and fifth DBS channels would not be allocated until BSB's service had been in operation for at least three years. BSB has recently said that it would be willing for that moratorium to be lifted. Accordingly, the United Kingdom's two remaining channels will be advertised early next year. Five high-quality DBS channels should soon be available to British viewers.

Viewers will continue to receive other satellite services directly, including those from proposed medium-powered satellites. We continue to work for international agreement for the supervision of programmes in such services and shall propose to Parliament sanctions against any unacceptable foreign satellite services received here.

The present ITV system will become a regionally based Channel 3. Licence holders will, for the first time, have a statutory obligation to provide regional programming, including programmes produced in the region.

The distinctive remit of Channel 4 will be retained and reinforced to sustain high quality programmes in the commercial sector. We consider that, after the necessary legislation, advertising on Channel 4 should be sold separately from that on Channel 3. Subject to those points, the White Paper sets out options on the future constitution of Channel 4. The Welsh Fourth Channel Authority will continue in essence unchanged.

All those commercial television services will be free to decide their own mix between advertising and subscription funding and will have greater freedom to raise money through sponsorship, subject to proper safeguards. All will be subject to consumer protection obligations on programme content. Most commercial television licences, including those for Channel 3 and Channel 5 services, will be allocated by competitive tender, subject to a quality threshold defined in the White Paper. Operators of Channels 3, 4 and 5 will be expected to show high-quality news and current affairs programmes dealing with national and international matters and to show the news, and possibly also current affairs, in main viewing periods. Channel 3 and Channel 5 will be expected to provide a diverse programme service appealing to a variety of tastes and interests to ensure that a minimum of 25 per cent. of original programming came from independent producers and that a proper proportion of programme material is of EC origin.

There will be one additional requirement affecting Channel 3 only. There will be continued provision, like that which brought ITN into existence, to ensure that there is at least one body effectively equipped and financed to provide news for Channel 3. There will be safeguards for the continued provision of a schools programmes service.

The Government agree with the Home Affairs Committee that a new agency, which might be called the Independent Television Commission, should be established, in place of the Independent Broadcasting Authority and the Cable Authority, to license and supervise all parts of the commercial television sector. It will be able to operate with a lighter touch than the IBA and without the

[Mr. Douglas Hurd]

IBA's detailed involvement in scheduling but, as the White Paper sets out, it will have strong sanctions against failure by its licensees to live up to their licence conditions.

The BBC will be expected to continue to provide high-quality programming across the full range of public tastes and interests. The Government look forward to the gradual introduction of subscription on the BBC's television services and to the eventual replacement of the licence fee—which will, however, continue at least for some time to come. We propose that the night hours from one of the BBC's channels should be assigned to the new ITC for allocation, like other licences by competitive tender. The BBC would keep the other set of night hours on the basis that it used it as fully as possible for making a start in developing subscription services.

We envisage that the part played by independent producers in programme making in the United Kingdom will continue to grow, as future licensees will be free to operate as publishers, without programme production capacity of their own. We believe that the transmission infrastructure should be separated from the programmes services.

The Government propose to proceed with the plans that I announced to the House on 19 January for the deregulation and expansion of independent radio, under the light touch regulation of a new Radio Authority. There will be scope for three new national commercial stations and as many as several hundred local services, including community radio stations.

The Broadcasting Standards Council, already established to reinforce standards on sex, violence, taste and decency, will be placed on a statutory footing. We propose that the exemption of broadcasting from the obscenity legislation should be removed at the earliest opportunity.

That is a brief summary of the main proposals set out in the White Paper. We aim to ensure that viewers and listeners have greater freedom of choice from a more varied output of programmes, including programmes of high quality. British television has a deservedly high reputation in the world and we expect that reputation to grow with the new opportunities that are now in sight.

The House will have an opportunity to debate the proposals before they are put into legislative form. We shall also take careful note of views expressed outside the House. We shall then bring forward legislation.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): Is the Home Secretary aware that his White Paper announces a number of aspirations for broadcasting with which the Opposition are in wholehearted agreement? We welcome the expansion in broadcasting and recognise the consequent need for changes in organisation. However, we at least know that expansion can bring diversity and high quality only if it is carefully regulated. The Home Secretary, having proclaimed the virtues of choice and quality, makes proposals that will result in a reduction in both.

Does not the right hon. Gentleman realise that, while competition has undoubted benefits in some areas of economic activity, the doctrinal obsession with markets revealed in his White Paper is bound to have an adverse effect on broadcasting? It is just not possible to pretend that viewers are given more choice if what they are offered is, in truth, just a number of extra channels that show programmes that are increasingly indistinguishable from each other and of a steadily deteriorating quality. That is the prospect which the White Paper holds out.

Will the Home Secretary consider the consequences of auctioning Channel 3 franchises to the highest bidder? It can result only in a deterioration in programme quality, which the minimum standards, laid down in paragraphs 6.10 and 6.11, will do little or nothing to arrest. Programme companies that obtain franchises from the highest bids will be forced into sacrificing new investments and the production of high-cost programmes. The Home Secretary has already conceded that some deterioration is already inevitable, by apparently removing from Channel 3 companies the specific obligation to broadcast high-cost drama, documentary and religious programmes. As a result, the new ITC powers that he announced today—that is, formal warning, right to revoke a franchise, and perhaps even the imposition of fines—are no more than window dressing. They are sanctions that reinforce regulations that are not in themselves strong enough to ensure high quality.

Does the Home Secretary not realise that standards will deteriorate even further when the competition that he claims to seek is reduced by the concentration of ownership? Will he confirm that, in paragraph 6.48, he asserts the need for ownership to be widespread, then announces the abandonment of present controls, and finally confesses that the Government do not have the slightest idea what regulation to put in their place? I make a prediction: they will not be regulations to which Mr. Rupert Murdoch takes exception.

The likelihood of increased uniformity has been heightened by the Home Secretary's decision to require Chanel 4 to sell its own advertising. In paragraph 6.23 of the White Paper, he reaffirms the importance of Channel 4 catering for tastes and interests not served by other independent channels. By forcing it into direct competition for advertising, he reduces the chances of Channel 4 providing such essential programmes. Does not the opinion of the Peacock report, which is quoted and endorsed in paragraph 32, illustrate the Home Secretary's basic error? That quotation asserts that the BBC must continue the production of high-quality broadcasts, because, even in a fully developed broadcasting market, independent companies will neglect such broadcasts. The White Paper makes that neglect more likely, and it does not help the BBC to perform its proper function.

The BBC is to be subject to what the White Paper elegantly calls—although the Home Secretary wisely did not refer to the phrase in his statement this afternoon—a "double squeeze". The value of the licence fee is likely to fall, and there can be absolutely no assurance that the necessary additional funds can be raised by subscription television; nor is subscription television a suitable way for the BBC to raise a major part of its revenue.

Paragraph 24 of the White Paper refers to subscription making it easier for high-quality programmes to be aimed profitably at particular sections of the market. The clear implication of that statement is that those who cannot afford high quality—the old and the poor in particular—will not get it. Clearly, the BBC will not be able, nor should it be prepared, to rely on subscriptions for a large part of its income. The result of the double squeeze is certain to do desperate damage to radio in particular, a subject to which the White Paper devotes an insulting page and three quarters.

Paragraph 8.7 includes the ominous message that BBC radio will rely on licence fees for some time to come, but there is no suggestion of how BBC radio will be financed when, as the Home Secretary intends, the licence fee is abolished. We have no doubt that the Government mean that, sooner or later, all radio will be commercial radio, and that will be a disaster. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"]

I conclude by asking the Home Secretary three specific questions. The statement says that Channel 3 companies will be free to decide their own mix between advertising and subscription. Does that mean that a company will be free to move to financing, predominantly based on the limited subscription system, or will a minimum figure be specified by the Home Secretary?

Secondly, will the Home Secretary explain the real meaning of his restrictions on control—the word in the White Paper—by non-EC companies? Am I right to fear that it will still be possible for an American conglomerate to own, either directly or through a subsidiary, companies broadcasting in Great Britain?

Thirdly, will the right hon. Gentleman assure us that the powers of the Broadcasting Standards Council, the "other things" that the White Paper coyly says are to be discussed with Lord Rees-Mogg, will not include the right to preview specific broadcasts?

This White Paper reflects commercial values rather than broadcasting values, as is to be expected from a policy that owes more to the Department of Trade and Industry than it does to the Home Office. It pretends to offer choice. In fact, many of the new channels will do no more than offer vast profits to the tycoons of international television. It is a giant retreat from the concept of public service broadcasting. Its result will be less diversity and lower standards.

Mr. Hurd: I think that the right hon. Gentleman must have written the last bit of his speech before he read the White Paper. As usual, his preliminary demonstrations bear little relation to what is actually proposed. This has not been a doctrinal exercise; it is something that we have worked at for a long time now to achieve the right balance between wider choice and the insistence on quality. I do not disagree with the original points that the right hon. Gentleman made and which he put in his lecture at Hexham last week. That is our aim, and I believe that we have found a sensible, practical way of doing that.

I refer to the right hon. Gentleman's specific points. On competitive tender, he has fixed on one point of what is essentially a three-part exercise. Somebody bidding for a franchise will first have to pass a quality threshold. That is not just consumer protection against pornography, excessive partisan politics, and so on. There are some specific things in the White Paper about diversity, about regionality—the regional content of programmes—about schools, and about news and current affairs. When that test is passed—it will be a stiff test—there will be the competitive tender, and then there will be the monitoring and enforcement by the new ITC of the quality threshold in operation.

If the right hon. Gentleman reads the White Paper and sees what is said about the yellow card, the red card, and the possible renewal of franchises, he will see that the business of enforcement is actually more specific that it is under the present arrangement. If he looks at those three stages all together, he will see that this is a serious balance between quality and wider choice.

Again, I entirely agree with what the right hon. Gentleman said in his speech about ownership on Friday. It is important, as the White Paper states, and as the right hon. Gentleman thought we were not going to say, that there should not be a concentration of ownership. Paragraph 6.48 states:

"But clear rules will also be needed which impose limits on concentration of ownership and on excessive cross-media ownership."

In paragraph 6.53 of the White Paper, we set out various stringent rules on which we invite comments. If the right hon. Gentleman reads the White Paper, he will see that they include

"no licence holder for a particular area should control other broadcast media for that area".

Then there is the relationship between United Kingdom satellites and franchises and international franchises. There is also the relationship between newspaper interests and the media. It is all there; it is just that the right hon. Gentleman has not got quite as far as that in his reading of the White Paper. If he looks at paragraph 6.50, he will see the answer to one of his specific questions about the control of franchises by non-EC companies.

We invite precise comments on possible ideas, but the principle of choice between various severe forms of regulation—that is surely what the right hon. Gentleman would expect of us—is there, and it is severe.

We are entirely clear that preserving the remit of Channel 4, with which the right hon. Gentleman also agrees, is an important part of getting the balance right. We set out different ways in which Channel 4 might be organised to preserve the remit while selling its own advertising. When the House looks in detail at those three options, we shall be interested to have a choice between them. I believe that we can all agree on the presentation of the remit, and that there can be a reasoned argument about how best to achieve it.

The right hon. Gentleman spoke about the BBC and the licence fee. I think that the BBC can be—I am trying to choose my words carefully—reasonably satisfied with the position. Between now and 1991, the licence fee will be indexed and increased in line with inflation as it was a week or so ago. After 1991, we shall discuss with the BBC the extent to which it would be reasonable to limit indexing to take account of what may have been earned by subscription. Subscription is an attractive idea, as I told the House when reporting on the Peacock report. We shall have to see how far it will go and in what form, but the BBC is being given a nudge in that direction, which I consider entirely reasonable.

When he talked about radio, the right hon. Gentleman neglected the fact that we have discussed it, and that Government publications on it have been produced. I am sorry that there is not legislative time in the immediate future for a radio Bill. I am keen to get on with the proposals for radio, which were well received at the time and which are rehearsed in summary form in the White Paper. But there is no neglect there; it is simply a matter of finding legislative time.

Having answered one of the right hon. Gentleman's specific questions, I shall now answer the other two. There will be no tilt in the balance between advertising and subscription: it will be open to the successful franchise holder to achieve a balance that he considers sensible. As for previewing, the White Paper does not add to what I have already told the House about the Broadcasting

[Mr. Hurd]

Standards Council. It will be put on a statutory basis. Lord Rees-Mogg, the chairman, is now discussing with the broadcasting authorities how he would operate, and he is making some progress in working out agreement on standards. [Interruption.] The right hon. Gentleman should be interested and approving, because this fits absolutely into his general approach—at least, I hope it does. Lord Rees-Mogg will let us know what he believes, in the light of the discussions, to be the right statutory basis for his authority, and we shall make proposals accordingly.

Having listened to the right hon. Gentleman, I believe that the difference between us is that he believes that the only way to sustain quality successfully is by restricting choice. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] That is the thrust of what the right hon. Gentleman has been saying. But we consider it a negative approach, which puts too much faith in the virtues of detailed bureaucratic regulation—which we have at present and which the IBA has been conscientiously discharging, but which we believe becomes otiose as wider choice is made available. We believe that our proposals offer the right balance between giving wider choice to the viewer and sustaining quality.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that today's statement and the remarks that he has just made will be warmly welcomed not only in the House but outside it? He is balancing carefully the era of change that is about to enter the broadcasting industry, and permitting the public the widest possible choice. His statement will be warmly received by members of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, many of whose key recommendations he has included in the White Paper.

Does my right hon. Friend accept that one of the main aspects of today's proposals is that the new "light touch" arrangements for the regulation of commercial television will be essential to maintaining the quality and standards of British television in the commercial sector, for which this country is rightly famous?

Let me conclude by saying that I would rather that the new authority was called the Commercial Television Authority.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He and his colleagues on both sides of the House certainly did a sterling job in producing their report, which undoubtedly influenced us at several points, including the proposal that the IBA and the Cable Authority should be merged into a single new body. As long as it smells sweet, I am not too passionate about its name, and we shall have plenty of opportunities to discuss that.

I agree with my hon. Friend that much will turn on the arrangements for the quality threshold, which I described in answer to the right hon. Gentleman and of which he neglected to take account. The arrangements for sustaining quality involve doing away with the detailed processes of scheduling and regulation of the ITV sector. They involve the BBC, which he called the cornerstone, the Channel 4 remit, the consumer protection provision for Channel 3, positive requirements for Channel 3, including news, schools and diversity, and the more rigorous proposals—the yellow card, the red card and the renewal of franchise arrangements. Taken together, I think that those proposals are an important part of the package.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): Does the Home Secretary recognise that my right hon. and hon. Friends greatly welcome the extension of consumer choice implicit in the new broadcasting technologies and in increasing competition? Does he also recognise, however, our extreme concern that he has not realised that the increasing multiplicity of channels will not of itself ensure that the public enjoy the quality and variety that we have experienced in this country, which is the envy of the world?

Does the right hon. Gentleman not recognise that the arrangements for competitive tendering for Channel 3 in particular will take money out of independent television, which could result in inferior programming, a narrowing of choice or a combination of both? Does he not recognise that the pace of technological change is not so fast that it requires us to abandon a regulatory regime that has uniquely secured for this country its rich, balanced mixture of entertainment, information and education, and of popular and minority programmes for everyone? Does he not recognise that the public are as interested in quality as in diversity? Channel 4 has been a brilliant achievement. Does the right hon. Gentleman not recognise that it has succeeded because it has had a secure source of finance, and that that has not been secured in the White Paper?

Finally, does the right hon. Gentleman acknowledge that some ambivalence has appeared in his statement, and indeed in the White Paper, between his commitment to what he calls a "light regulatory touch" and his emphasis on the significance of positive programme requirements? In which does he believe?

Mr. Hurd: I must say that the fizz seems to be going out of the attack. Let me say with the greatest courtesy that I have always regarded the hon. Gentleman as one of nature's regulators. He would naturally put emphasis on a detailed system of regulation to remedy every ill, but I feel that television is moving out of that system.

Of course I agree with the hon. Gentleman's main point, that wider choice might not automatically mean diversity. But our proposal is that it should—that it must. There should not simply be a wider choice between quiz shows on different channels. If he reads the White Paper, the hon. Gentleman will see that the thrust of its proposals is to ensure that wider choice for the viewer is real choice, and not simply a choice between identikit shows. He believes that the right way to achieve that is to bring all new opportunities such as the satellite and Channel 5 under the same detailed control, with numerous officials sitting down and regulating exactly what—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] That is a consequence of the hon. Gentleman's rhetoric. I do not believe it. I believe that television in this country is fast growing out of that framework. We need a new framework ensuring diversity, as the hon. Gentleman mentions, but not relying for that diversity on this kind of nit-picking.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): Will my right hon. Friend say a little more about cable, in which he knows that I have an interest? Is it still the policy of Her Majesty's Government to maintain conditions in which, given entrepreneurship on the part of cable television companies, the urban areas of the United Kingdom will have the prospect of being cabled within a reasonable time, with the opportunities that that will bring of interactive services and more competitive telecommunications?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, indeed. For various reasons cable has made a slowish start, but it is beginning to pick up. That is both good news and important. We now have the new technology, MVDS, and it was consideration of that which held us up for several weeks. The question is how that new technology should be used. Should it be used simply and solely to help cable forward, or should it be possible for people to use that technology independently of cable? Cable will want to use that technology, and that is entirely legitimate. My right hon. Friend will see from the White Paper the rather complicated balance that we are trying to strike, safeguarding the interests of the existing cable franchise holders and perhaps of those applying now, while not harnessing MVDS technology absolutely to cable. I believe that there is room for both, and certainly, as I know my right hon. Friend hopes, for cable to use MVDS to facilitate its growth.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Will the Home Secretary accept that, if there is to be choice, the choice must be for all, and that for choice for all, all modes of communication must be available to each and every person? For those in rural areas, that means cable and satellite as well as the five terrestrial channels proposed. Does the Home Secretary agree that the track record of cable in the past few years has been more than a little disappointing? Does he further agree that the White Paper does little to encourage the companies to increase cabling across the country and that without cable and other modes being available to rural and other areas, there cannot possibly be choice for all?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman has gone a little astray. A whole series of technologies are moving forward. We have terrestrial television which can reach more people and use more of the spectrum than previously; we have cable, MVDS, satellite and, most important, radio. All are poised for further development. I do not know, and the White Paper does not pretend to guess, which will turn out to be acceptable more quickly than others. That is why I say that we must enable development rather than declare a blueprint. The White Paper takes each to see how we can create a framework into which it can be fitted. The hon. Gentleman may be right about cable and I do not deny what he said. It is now progressing fast after some disappointing years. But I do not think that he is arguing that we should put taxpayers' money into it, as other countries have. Let it be enabled together with the other technologies and we shall see what viewers and entrepreneurs make of it and whether it is the preferred technology.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): I welcome my right hon. Friend's recognition that the television industry must adapt and that the changes proposed in the White Paper offer an exciting challenge to the industry and a wider choice to viewers. Anyone who has been to the lightly regulated market of New York will know that our choice is extremely restricted. Does my right hon. Friend recognise that, even among those who welcome his proposals, some are worried about some of them—for example, the tax on turnover? If that is not sensitively handled, it could undermine the ability of independent television companies to cope successfully with the increased competition and to provide a greater quality of programming under the new regime. Will my right hon. Friend assure the House that he will listen to those anxieties?

Mr. Hurd: I entirely accept that, as the dust settles, hon. Members like my hon. Friend, who knows the industry well, will want to raise a large number of specific and practical points. There is an immediate problem about the nature of the levy in this transitional period, and I owe the industry a decision and statement about that soon. My hon. Friend asked about the permanent arrangements. We believe that there is a strong case on the grounds of encouraging efficiency to move from a profits-based to a revenue-based levy. That principle is set out in the White Paper. Obviously, we shall listen to representations about how that should be worked out and applied.

Dr. David Owen (Plymouth, Devonport): I welcome the diversity and the choice inherent in these proposals, but does the Home Secretary accept that concentration of ownership is a crucial issue? Unless the House can be satisfied on that issue, it would be unwise to deregulate to the extent which he asks the House to accept. Having long argued for an auctioning of licences on Channel 3 and Channel 5, may I ask whether the sum of money that comes in, which could be considerable, will be earmarked for public service broadcasting, particularly on Radio 4 and BBC 2? The Home Secretary asked for views about Channel 4. I hope that he will retain it as a non-profit-making company, although taking advertisements.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his first point, and I agree with it. Measures against the concentration of ownership are crucial, and I would not come before the House with a Bill for deregulation which did not also include measures against the concentration of ownership. That is set out in the White Paper——

Mr. Hattersley: No, it is not.

Mr. Hurd: —when the right hon. Gentleman has read that far. I agree with the general point made by the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen).The proceeds of the competitive tender will be earmarked for the Treasury as the public's receipt from franchises of leases of a public asset. I am sorry, but I have forgotten the right hon. Gentleman's last point——

Dr. Owen: Channel 4.

Mr. Hurd: I note what the right hon. Gentleman said about Channel 4. He has already chosen one option, and we shall be glad of views from all sides on that matter.

Mr. John Gorst (Hendon, North): In welcoming my right hon. Friend's statement, may I say that it is the most culturally literate development in broadcasting in the 33 years since the BBC lost its monopoly? Will he bear in mind the fact that, during the past 33 years, the Opposition have continuously said that improvements in broadcasting can take place only as a result of the iron grip of regulation and control? At this point, would my right hon. Friend summarise the criteria and principles which have guided the 20 or so new developments contained in this White Paper?

Mr. Hurd: I hope that it breathes through the White Paper that quality and a wider choice for viewers and listeners go hand in hand at the top of the list.

[Mr. Hurd]

Independence, meaning a proper place for independent producers and independence against the concentration of ownership, probably comes third. Although the Government would not enforce this, reality will: that viability is the fourth. In other words, the proposals must make sense in terms of what viewers are prepared to accept and finance. Those four—quality, choice, independence and viability—are the criteria.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Does the Home Secretary accept that this is not only a bad day for Britain, but for the reputation of Britain in the world? Our broadcasting system has been the great jewel of our reputation both culturally and educationally. He has never understood that its excellence depends on regulation, that regulation ensures diversity of programme and opinion, and that more channels of themselves do not ensure more kinds of programmes. Does the Home Secretary agree that the majority viewing that has been built up for apparently specialist programmes, such as the Attenborough and Bellamy programmes, will not happen under a wholly commercial structure?

Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that he is proposing a minor ghetto for public service broadcasting and commercial freedom for cash for media entrepreneurs? Does he agree that the so-called "light touch" is a means of ensuring that the only competition that will take place will be between different kinds of pap? Is it not time that the Home Secretary took the whole damn lot—Peacock, the Green Paper and himself—out of this Chamber? Is it not time that we took broadcasting away from the Home Office and gave it to a proper Ministry that was interested in standards and programmes?

Mr. Hurd: I know that the hon. Gentleman has always been in favour of a Ministry of Broadcasting, and indeed a shadow Ministry of Broadcasting, and I do not object to those perfectly legitimate ambitions. I remember him posing away the other night in the Sinn Fein debate about the White Paper making the world safe for Murdoch and Maxwell. At least he has not repeated that today. Unlike the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, perhaps he has read paragraph 6.48, which deals with the concentration of ownership. Those who run BBC 1, BBC 2 and Channel 4 —three of the four existing terrestrial channels—would be a little surprised to hear themselves described by the hon. Gentleman as a "minor ghetto" in British broadcasting. They are not. Those three channels will sustain exactly the responsibilities that they have now and which the hon. Gentleman wishes to preserve. I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman. He speaks with the genuine voice of the old-fashioned regulator, whom time has passed by.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that the Home Secretary said that there will be a debate later on the White Paper. I request hon. Members to ask single questions, not to go into the matter in great detail, because they will have other opportunities. On that basis, I shall allow questions to continue for 15 minutes.

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): Tens of millions of dollars have been spent on political television advertising in the American presidential elections, which are mercifully coming to an end. Will my right hon. Friend assure us that the new broadcasting arrangements will prevent direct or indirect political advertising on the air?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, I give my hon. Friend that assurance.

Mr. Eric S. Heffer (Liverpool, Walton): I shall obey your strictures, Mr. Speaker. I should tell the Home Secretary that no Opposition Member has seen the White Paper because it has only just come in. The Home Secretary talked about quality control, but who will carry out that control? Who will determine it? Can we ensure that in future, instead of the trivia that we increasingly get on television, with all these game shows, we shall have programmes such as "Brideshead Revisited", the Miss Marple series and "Fortunes of War"? How can he guarantee that we will get such quality programmes if the interests of profit come first?

Mr. Hurd: The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is, the BBC and the ITC. Those who run the BBC will continue to supply the hon. Gentleman with Miss Marple to his and their hearts' content: there will be no change in that respect. The ITC will require variety and diversity from the applicants for franchises. It will be impossible for someone successfully to bid for a franchise, however long his purse, if he is proposing to broadcast only a series of quiz shows.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): As to radio, does my right hon. Friend accept that the high standard of British music, which is a national asset, owes a great deal to the BBC's Radio 3? Will he enlarge on what action the Government intend to take in the long run to uphold the high musical standards of Radio 3?

Mr. Hurd: That is a matter for the BBC. Nothing in these proposals would prevent that from continuing.

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): Will the Secretary of State accept that I and my hon. Friends are impressed by the stand that he is taking against the concentration of ownership in television? What steps will he and his hon. Friends take to guard against the concentration of ownership in the print media? Will he assure us that there will be no exceptions to such concentrations of ownership, even if the companies involved are the most fervent supporters of the Government?

Mr. Hurd: I gladly swallow the hon. Lady's compliment, but I shall not answer her second question. Because of the breakdown of restrictive practices in the press it is becoming increasingly possible, locally and nationally, to produce newspapers at lower prices—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Paisley, South will be calling The Independent a poor ghetto in a minute.

That is what is happening, and it is a healthy development.

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his proposals to abolish the IBA and to establish an Independent Television Commission to take broadcasting into the 21st century. Will he consider an expansion of that to include telecommunications? May I express the hope that the excellent IBA engineering division will be invited to tender for the new privatised transmission systems? What plans does my right hon.

Friend have to encourage investment in cable television and to relax the regulations governing overseas investment in cable?

Mr. Hurd: We are considering the matter raised in my hon. Friend's second point, although it is not defined in the White Paper. On the first point, important transitional arrangements will have to be made for the IBA. We have begun to discuss that with the authority, and this morning I had a word with the chairman and director general, who stressed the importance of the matter. I entirely understand that. They have a staff—a skilled staff—to consider. None of the changes can take place before Parliament has approved the necessary legislation. That will give us time to formulate transitional arrangements to deal with the points made by my hon. Friend.

Neither I nor the White Paper join in any denunciation of the IBA. Although I criticise the bureaucratic niggling, I recognise that that is the job which Parliament laid upon the authority in the 1981 Act and which the hon. Member for Paisley, South (Mr. Buchan) continues to glorify. Time has moved on and passed that by, and the detailed regulation that the authority has carried out, as Parliament wished, is unnecessary. But that does not mean that those who have carried it out should be condemned.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): We can all sympathise with the Home Secretary in his humiliation at having to introduce this glossy distillation of the prejudices of Lord Young of Graffham, Saatchi and Saatchi and the Prime Minister. But the grubby changes in the ITV franchises and the abolition of the IBA pose a direct threat to serious programming, especially to current affairs, which is likely to undermine the basis of "World in Action", "First Tuesday" and "This Week" and to cause them to go the way that "Weekend World" has gone. What became of the old Conservative maxim, "If it ain't broke, don't fix it"?

Mr. Hurd: I do not blame the hon. Gentleman, who unlike the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, has not had time to read the White Paper. Had he read it, he would have seen that standing out among the positive requirements of any applicant for a Channel 3 franchise will be the provision of news and current affairs programmes at times when people are viewing or listening. Moreover, section 22 of the Broadcasting Act 1981 provides that there should be at least one organisation providing high-quality news and international news that is sustained by the franchise holders. That is the basis of Independent Television News and that will be preserved. The hon. Gentleman's fears are unfounded.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Will my right hon. Friend clarify precisely what the White Paper means when it says that the new Independent Television Commission will have a lighter regulatory touch to encourage lighter programme requirements? Does my right hon. Friend agree that ITV programming has not always been noted for its gravity and that the IBA has not always been noted for its severity? How does he answer the fear that a lighter regulatory touch may mean television stations with the editorial standards of the lower tabloids?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think that my hon. Friend's conclusion follows from his premise. The fact that he disagrees with some decisions made by the IBA does not justify the existence of much detailed bureaucratic scheduling, most of which never reaches the light of day but is carried out conscientiously by the IBA as part of its present duties. It is not tenable to continue that. That is what we mean by the "lighter touch".

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): How does the Home Secretary expect the House to take seriously his assurances about preserving standards in broadcasting when he is to abolish the IBA and is announcing his intention to move towards privatising the BBC? How moveable is he in this consultative document? If there is much protest about, for example, the abolition of the IBA, will he come to the House and say, "I accept what has been said"?

May I congratulate the Home Secretary on being the first Minister who has not succumbed to the temptation of putting his own grinning face on the front page of a glossy White Paper? That self-denying ordinance should be referred to all members of the Cabinet.

Mr. Hurd: I am obliged for the hon. Gentleman's second point. I believe that the IBA should be moved together with the Cable Authority. To be honest, that was not a view that we had firmly reached before we received the report of the Select Committee on Home Affairs, which recommended it. It is common sense to bring together those regulatory authorities and give them a common framework in which to operate. That is what we are proposing and that is something to which we will hold.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if one listened to the Opposition, one might think my right hon. Friend had introduced reform for reform's sake rather than reform being forced on the Government by changing technology? Has not the White Paper been a rational, sensible and practical way forward for the future of broadcasting? What effect does my right hon. Friend expect there to be on the BBC when the BBC and the IBA are separated from the licence fee regime? The IBA is currently received in conjunction with the BBC, and only if the BBC licence fee is paid. Secondly, at what level does he believe the subscription would be for IBA viewers—who, after all, currently receive that service free?

Mr. Hurd: I am not entirely following my hon. Friend's point, but we believe that subscription is attractive in principle. The BBC is beginning to experiment with it on one of its night channels; so, too, is the satellite DBS. There is scope for further experimentation, and we propose to nudge the BBC in that direction, without being dogmatic at present as to how far that could go.

If my hon. Friend was talking about the point raised by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, of course, BBC radio is a problem. BBC radio is financed out of the licence fee and there is no question of doing away with it, because I regard it as essential to the general structure of broadcasting. As we move towards subscription, that will be a problem which will clearly come on to the agenda fairly soon. I accept that, but we are not at that stage yet. We are at the stage of indexing the licence fee and taking account after 1991 of the extent to which the BBC might reasonably benefit from subscription income. I hope that that meets my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): I have not read paragraph 6.48, which the right hon. Gentleman constantly referred to, which is about the concentration of ownership. However, is the concentration of ownerhsip specific to television or does it cover also the concentration of ownership within the media? Frankly, with the amount of media and press publishing controlled by Murdoch and Maxwell—I do not mean "the Murdochs" and "the Maxwells"; I mean Murdoch and Maxwell—they should not have even a finger in the pie of any television company. Does the concentration of ownership cross over from television to the press, or is the paragraph exclusive to television? If so, it does not go far enough.

Mr. Hurd: Yes, that is why, in paragraph 6.53, one of the principles that we lay down is:

"national newspaper interests in national services using United Kingdom broadcasting frequencies (and vice versa) should be limited; and a similar principle should apply in the case of local services and the local press. One possibility"— not going as far as the hon. Gentleman would like—

"would be to follow the reciprocal 20 per cent. limit already proposed in the case of radio".

However, we go further than that, because another conceivable mischief is that people who own a lot of international television would move in and take franchises; that, too, is covered in this part of the White Paper. We would have to ensure that they did not get the franchises.

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I am sure that my right hon. Friend will agree that regional television companies will greatly welcome the Government's continuing commitment to the regional structure of ITV. I note in paragraph 2 of the annex to the report that the function of the ITC will be to decide with the Government on that regional structure. Can my right hon. Friend tell us how he sees that structure regionally compared with the present structure? Does he accept that the important role of the ITC means that it is essential that a chairman for the new authority is appointed at the earliest possible opportunity?

Mr. Hurd: As my hon. Friend knows, what we need in the near future is a successor to Lord Thomson of Monifieth as chairman of the IBA. What follows for the ITC is something that can be settled a bit later, because the ITC is so far just a proposal in a White Paper which Parliament will want to debate and reach conclusions on.

My hon. Friend mentioned an important point about the regions. We do not think it would be sensible for the Government to lay down in a White Paper the exact frontiers of the regions. My hon. Friend comes from a part of the world where that is a live issue from time to time. I believe that that is something that Governments should have at arm's length and which the new ITC should settle. However, we are emphatic that the regional principle should not only be kept, but should be strengthened when we are dealing with Channel 3 and the ITV franchises.

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that, even if the Government were to succeed in preventing a concentration of ownership, the danger is that an increase in competition for advertisers, together with the so-called "light touch" regime, will mean that the overwhelming influence will be in the hands of the advertisers? That will lead to restrictions in choice and the lowering of standards. That has been the experience of every country that relies on competition rather than regulation.

Mr. Hurd: I do not believe that is entirely right. Channel 4 is doing well. It is paying for itself and has carved out for itself a particular form of advertising market that obviously works. There is a strong argument that Channel 4 could be completely privatised and still retain that rather special advertising finance which would enable it to keep the remit. There are counter-arguments, which are set out in the White Paper. I do not agree that it has been the experience up to now that keeping a certain number of channels financed by advertisers has the effect to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): As the Minister of State has been defending the United Kingdom's commercial interest so well over the Council of Europe draft convention, can my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary tell us that there are no proposals in the White Paper that will fall foul of that convention? Additionally, will the proposals on the BBC mean a change in the BBC's charter?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend's first point is quite right. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton) has been doing noble work in trying to reach an international agreement in the Council of Europe, which is dealt with in the White Paper. We are keen that that should be concluded. My hon. Friend has made a good deal of progress in resolving the difficulty about advertising breaks. Other member states of the Council of Europe have raised difficulties, but we hope to have a further meeting in Stockholm later this month, which my hon. Friend will attend, and it is possible that decisive progress will then be made.

The BBC charter expires at the end of 1996 and there are no proposals to seek to alter it before then. I suppose that those people who are around in 1994 will begin a new debate about what the revised charter should contain. At that stage, some of the points mentioned today and contained in the White Paper will come to the fore, and by then we shall know more about the way subscription has gone.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Does the Home Secretary accept that many of us are deeply concerned about the regional implications due to the failure of the White Paper to bring forward a clear framework on the takeover procedures, because it seems likely that powerful predators will be able to put profit before variety, standards and quality? Can he tell us why there is no specific reference to SC4 and the provision for Gaelic, as there is for the Welsh channel and the Welsh language?

Mr. Hurd: There is provision, because my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland insisted that there should be. If we cannot find the reference in the next few seconds, I will inform the hon. Lady later. The provision is there, it is very specific and it will fully satisfy.

I have been informed that it is paragraph 6.37. It says:

"The Government recognises the importance of broadcasting to the Gaelic language and its future development and, while no change is implied in present policies towards Gaelic broadcasting at national or regional level, new local services could be an important means of meeting Gaelic needs."

It is better news for the hon. Lady.

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the main barrier to the effective exercise of popular choice on television is the continued existence of the BBC licence fee? If the evidence is that subscription will not lead to an early demise of the licence fee after 1991, will my right hon. Friend be ready to consider alternative forms of funding for the BBC that will lead to an early abolition of the licence?

Mr. Hurd: I have got into trouble in the past for saying that, as choice multiplies, the rationale behind the BBC licence fee—which is paid whether one does or does not watch the BBC—becomes weak. I believe that that is true; that is why I do not believe that the licence fee should be regarded as immortal. We have set out carefully in the White Paper the steps that we propose to take to nudge the BBC towards looking at subscription, but it is too early to answer my hon. Friend's point. The Peacock report's advice, which we accepted, was against having advertising on the BBC. The White Paper does not reopen that question.

Mr. Hattersley: The Home Secretary has said some 10 or 12 times that the White Paper is explicit and specific in its proposal to avoid concentration. If that is the case, why does the paragraph dealing with that subject conclude, after several sentences of platitudes:

"the Government would welcome comments on the scope and formulation of such rules"?

Do the Government know what they intend or not? The Home Secretary should face the fact that, if the argument between us is to be about "choice", he must try to concentrate on what that word means. For viewers to have a real choice there must be real alternatives between which they can choose. Does he not worry to the slightest degree that he will reduce variety by placing so much power in the hands of the producers in the market that he will attempt to create?

Mr. Hurd: On the first point—I think that the right hon. Gentleman is on a false point—we state quite clearly in paragraph 6.48:

"clear rules will also be needed which impose limits on concentration of ownership".

In paragraph 6.53, we sketch the ground that those rules will need to cover, which I have already outlined in answer to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). The general principles include newspapers, concentration of ownership within the television industry and the possible concentration among foreign holders of television interests and our own. Those are possible proposals set out to consider the concentration of ownership.

Since we are a democratic and listening Government —[Interruption.]—particularly in this sphere, we have asked for views on precisely how those principles, which are absolutely clear and firm, should be applied. The right hon. Gentleman would have been furious if, almost a year before we introduced legislation, we said that, on this important issue, our minds were entirely closed. The principles are there, they are firm and they meet the points which the right hon. Gentleman has raised. After he has finished his rhetoric, should he favour us with precise ideas on how the principles should be implemented, we shall add them to our own and those expressed by other hon. Members who have raised this issue.

As I told the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen), when we come next year, to produce a detailed plan for this House to consider, he is right to say that side by side with the proposals for deregulation must be proposals against a concentration of ownership.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry that I have not been able to call all the hon. Members who wished to participate, but as usual, I shall keep a list and give them precedence when this matter comes before the House again.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When the Home Secretary began his statement the White Paper was available in the Vote Office. As you will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, it is extremely difficult within two or three minutes, to examine that document. There is a summary, in the Home Secretary's statement, and as soon as he began that statement, copies were distributed in the Press Gallery. That statement is not available in the Vote Office, but I believe that it should be because it gives a more comprehensive summary of the position rather than having to go through the entire White Paper. If you, Mr. Speaker, could deprecate the omission of a statement from the Vote Office when a White Paper is placed there, it would help all of us.

Mr. Speaker: It is normal practice for embargoed copies of a ministerial statement to be issued to the press, but they are embargoed until the Secretary of State gets up —[Interruption] I really do not see why the press should have those statements before Members. It is not for me to impose the practice, but I believe that it would be helpful to the House if summaries could be put in the Vote Office with the White Paper.

Orders of the Day

Rate Support Grants Bill

Considered in Committee.

[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair.]

Ordered,

That the Bill be considered in the following order: Clauses 1 and 2, Schedule 1, Clause 3, Schedule 2, Clauses 4 to 7, new Clauses, and new Schedules.—[Mr. Gummer.]

TOTAL EXPENDITURE: 1985-86 to 1988-89

5.4 pm

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 9, at end insert

'except where in relation to any year a local authority has before 7th July 1988 approved its accounts in which case he shall treat total expenditure as equal to the amount approved by the authority'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 19, in page 1, line 9, at the end insert

'except where in relation to any year a local authority has before 7th July 1988 approved its accounts and submitted them to the district auditor in which case he shall treat total expenditure as equal to the amount approved by the authority.'.

No. 4, in schedule 1, page 8, line 44, at end insert

'except where paragraph 3A applies'.

No. 6, in page 8, line 50, after 'the relevant amount', insert

'except where paragraph 3B applies'.

No. 8, in page 8, line 50, after 'the relevant amount' insert

'subject to sub-paragraph (2A) below.'.

No. 9, in page 8, line 50, at end insert—

'(2A) Where a local authority has made a decision before 7th July 1988 which affects its total expenditure in relation to the year and the authority has submitted to the Secretary of State by 31st January 1989 a statement certified by the auditor appointed under Part III of the Local Government Finance Act 1982 that the decision increases or decreases the authority's total expenditure by a certified amount, the relevant amount is (as regards the authority) the amount submitted under sub-paragraph (2) above as adjusted by the certified amount.'.

No. 5, in page 9, line 40, at end insert—

'3A.—(1) This paragraph applies where a local authority has approved its accounts after 6th July 1988 and before 31st October 1988 and where the amount of its total expenditure in relation to the year has been certified by the auditor appointed under Part III of the Local Government Finance Act 1982.

(2) In such a case the relevant amount is the amount certified by the auditor.'.

No. 7, in page 9, line 40, at end insert—

'3B.(1)—This paragraph applies where—

(a) A local authority or a Committee of a local authority has received before 7th July 1988 from the person having responsibility for the administration of its financial affairs a report containing estimates of expenditure in the relation to the year, and

(b) the authority has submitted to the Secretary of State before 31st January 1989 a statement containing an amount of total expenditure consistent with the estimates and certified by the auditor appointed under Part III of the Local Government Finance Act 1982.

(2) In such a case the relevant amount is the amount certified by the auditor.

(3) Where there is more than one report received, the report referred to in sub-paragraph (1)(a) above is the latest to be received before 7th July 1988.'.

Mr. Rooker: This is the largest group of amendments and, in effect, they encompass four separate points although they are all related to the retrospective nature of the Bill and the fact that many local authorities feel extremely hard done by because of the nature of the Government's announcement in July. Certainly I do not intend to repeat the points that I made on Second Reading last week, but obviously I suspect there will be constant reference to those local authorities that will lose considerable sums of money because of the operation of the Bill.

The purpose of amendment No. 1 and the purpose of several other amendments, is to allow information that was known about a local authority's expenditure and which was already in the public domain before 7 July, to be used, even though that information had not been received by the Secretary of State. His closedown date for such information was midnight 6 July.

Amendment No. 1 is certainly the most straightforward of the amendments, which will inevitably contain a great degree of technical detail. It deals specifically with the circumstances of an authority which had approved the accounts for any of the years beginning 1985-86, 1986-87 or 1987-88. Of course I accept that the amendment principally affects the year 1987-88 because, in most cases, the 1985-86 and 1986-87 accounts had been closed before the beginning of this year.

Although accounts may have been closed, it would not normally be a matter that would be immediately reported to the Department of the Environment. I understand that, for the accounts for 1987-88, the normal course of events would have been for the authorities to report the outturn of expenditure on a group of forms, not due for return to the Department of the Environment until 1 August. They would not even have been issued by the Department until 24 June. Of course, 6 July comes virtually in the middle of those two dates.

Authorities that have been prompt in closing their accounts and have managed to reduce expenditure below the level anticipated in their budgets or have produced revised estimates are now denied any advantage they would have received because of the Secretary of State's insistence on using information that was received by him before 7 July. Those authorities feel roughly treated, to put it mildly.

At this stage I shall give one example that has been well documented. The authority does not constitute a large urban area—I tended to concentrate upon such examples on Second Reading. It is helpful that my new example comes from a district in the constituency of a Cabinet member. Obviously that is advantageous because I do not want to be seen to be seeking to make partisan points. This is an example of local government feeling badly treated by central Government. Last week I made it clear that Conservative authorities will lose hundreds of millions of pounds, as will Labour authorities, and that it will be the ratepayers and the poll tax payers who will have to foot the bill.

I hope that the Minister will give us the reason why West Somerset district council has been so roughly treated. I should like to draw the attention of the Committee to correspondence sent from that council to its Member of Parliament, the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. A few short sentences, giving the relevant dates, show how a well-run, efficient authority, which is not large, has been shortchanged by more than £100,000 as a result of the Bill. The letter was sent to the Secretary of State from the treasurer and is dated 11 July. It makes it clear that as a result of the decision of midnight on 6 July, the council will lose £133,000.

It is worth giving details of some of the dates because that will show how other authorities are affected. The treasurer states:

"On 4th March 1988 I returned RER89 showing the Council's revised estimated 1987-88 'Total Expenditure' for Rates Support Grant of £1,621,000. On 6th May, 1988 the Council's Final Accounts for 1987-88 were completed and the actual 'Total Expenditure' for Rate Support Grant was £1,477,808. The effect of this reduction of £143,000 enabled me to calculate an additional amount of Rate Support Grant of £133,000 at a marginal grant rate of 93p for every £1 of reduced expenditure."

The treasurer made it clear that there had been a reduction from what was originally budgeted. Whereas councils that spend over the figures laid down by the Government have their grant reduced, if councils spend under those figures, they get additional grant that is not even pro rata, in this case, 93p for every £1 of reduced expenditure.

The treasurer continues:

"The Council's Statement of Accounts for 1987-88 was completed on 18th May, 1988 and signed by me.

The Council's Finance Sub Committee received a report . . . on 14th June, 1988 about the Final Accounts-General Rate Fund Net Rate Fund Expenditure 1987-88 which it approved.

The Department of the Environment sent me the Annual Revenue Outturn Returns for 1987-88 including the Rate Support Grant Return on 24th June, 1988 which I received on Tuesday 28th June, 1988. This was four weeks later than in 1987. My Deputy tackled them immediately and completed them on Wednesday, 6th July, 1988. All Returns were posted 2nd class the next day".

That local authority saved ratepayers' money and did not automatically use first-class post. There was no reason to do so.

The letter continues:

"the Department stipulates that it requires them back by 1st August, 1988."

Clearly, the Department would have received the returns by 1 August. However, in the meantime, the 6 July decision was made and as a result the council lost £133,000.

I ask the Minister what was slipshod and lethargic about the council's behaviour. What was inefficient about the way in which the council dealt with the forms that it was required to send to the Department, and the way in which the treasurer and his deputy dealt with its committee meetings? What is lethargic, incompetent or inefficient about that? The council lost a considerable sum. I do not know what the percentage is, but it will be a fairly hefty percentage of the council's expenditure.

The reply from the Secretary of State for the Environment to his Cabinet colleague can be summed up as, "Tough." According to the treasurer, the £133,000 is "a loss equivalent to a 2·2p rate for ratepayers in West Somerset."

When ratepayers in west Somerset get their rate demands for next year, over 2p in the pound will be a direct result of the council being short-changed through the Government choosing an unfair, arbitrary date and then not wanting to take on board other information that was already in the public domain. That council would not seek to change a single figure in the accounts to which I have referred. No creative accounting is involved. All the information went before the committees and was dealt with in public. The council does not seek to change any of it. All it says is that because it was public information, the Department of the Environment should take it on board and look at the accounts accordingly.

Amendment No. 5 and its paving amendment, No. 4, require the Secretary of State to take into account local authorities' final expenditure figures for 1987-88 in determining their grant entitlement in cases where the authority had approved its accounts and had them certified by its auditor after 6 July but before 31 October 1988. The significance of the latter is that that was the date of the Bill's Second Reading.

Again, the information would be available already. We are addressing ourselves simply to the arbitrary cut-off date of 6 July. The accounts would be certified by an auditor. The amendment would require the Secretary of State to take into account information later than 6 July if it met the relevant criteria. He would have to take into account increases in expenditure that would reduce grant as well as reductions in expenditure that would increase grant, which is the example that I have just given from west Somerset. On past trends, local authorities' final expenditure would be lower in aggregate than the earlier estimates, so there would be a net recoupment of holdback grant. Even so, the Treasury would still gain.

The Minister should consider that seriously. We are looking at the period from 6 July until 31 October, which is not arbitrary, but the date of the Bill's Second Reading. That is another point that should be considered as the Bill goes through its legislative process, although one can hardly call what is happening today a legislative process because the Bill will not receive the scrutiny that it deserves.

For practical purposes, I should like to call amendments Nos. 6 and 7 the Brent amendments because they are about the effect on the London borough of Brent. The amendments would allow the latest expenditure estimates for 1987-88, prepared by the director of finance or the treasurer of an authority before 7 July, to be substituted for the latest figures received by the Department of the Environment.

Let me give the reasons for the amendments. Clearly, local authorities did not know before 7 July of the Secretary of State's intention to use the latest information available to him as the final basis of calculation for the rate support grant in 1987-88 or, indeed, any of the two previous years. That was a secret. The Secretary of State's scheme to come to the House to make his statement would not have worked if it had not been a secret. That was a necessary part of his plan. As a consequence, authorities were unaware of the need to get the latest estimates for expenditure for 1987-88 to the DOE. The authorities could have sent earlier estimates. As a result, the Government were using estimates which were too high and local authorities will lose grant. It is only fair that amendment No. 7 would allow local authorities to replace the DOE's assumption with later estimates.

[Mr. Rooker]

It is important to note that amendment No. 7 will only allow that substitution if the following five conditions are met. First, it will allow substitution if the later estimates were received from the director of finance or treasurer by the local authority or a committee of the local authority, in other words, if the estimates are a matter of public record. No local authorities hold meetings in secret. If they do, we would like to know about them because that is not supposed to be the case. We are looking for information which is clearly in the public domain.

The second condition is if the later estimates were received by the authority before 7 July—that is, before the date of the Secretary of State's announcement—so there is no question of the estimates being doctored after the statement.

The third condition is that the authority makes known to the DOE by 31 January next that it has later estimates so that there will be no additional work for DOE staff in finding the latest estimates from each authority. We do not want to impose extra work on the hard-pressed civil servants in the DOE.

Fourthly, the district auditor—who is independent—must certify that the total expenditure figure submitted fulfills the requirement of the law in that it is the latest estimate before 7 July 1988 and that the total expenditure figure is consistent with the estimates.

The final condition is that the report to be used as the basis of the substitution should be the latest report prepared for the director of finance or treasurer before the 7 July deadline, so that there is no scope for any authority to choose the most favourable report. Some authorities may have three or four estimates, some higher and some lower than others. We do not want to allow an authority to choose one, knowing the new rules, to maximise its grant. I am referring to the latest estimate that has been prepared and presented to the authority.

If the Minister for Local Government wants to accept any of the amendments or to intervene at any time, I will gladly shut up and sit down and we can then make further progress. I take that for granted in Committee. I am not here to listen to the sound of my own voice or to talk to Ministers if they do not listen to me. I offer that opportunity to the Minister in a spirit of co-operation.

Clearly, the Minister is not about to accept the amendment and I must therefore surmise why the Minister will rubbish it. First, he will say that there is scope for ambiguity about the total expenditure figure and therefore it is not certain. Obviously there is certainty in the Bill at the moment and it will mean extremely rough justice for many local authorities. The Government will argue that local authorities should be free to choose whether they submit a certified statement. If that approach is taken, all authorities should be treated in the same way. The Minister might also say that the amendment will delay the making of a supplementary report for 1987-88 until the new year.

For the benefit of my education, the Opposition's advisers have provided me with replies to those objections which the Minister might use. I will cite this advice now because it will save bother later and reinforce my points about Brent.

We argue that there will be certainty about the appropriate total expenditure figure because of the five safeguards, or conditions, which I have referred to in some detail. There will be no change if a local authority does not submit a certified statement. Clearly it is up to the authority to do that. If it submits such a statement, the Government will know that it is consistent with the latest estimate to the authority or its committee before 7 July and that it is the latest estimate. The district auditor will be required to certify that that is the case. There is no scope for ambiguity.

Those authorities which submit a statement will only regain grant that they were entitled to before the advent of the Bill. As I said last week, local authorities had every expectation that the £512 million would in due course be available to them and not paid back to the Treasury. We are not talking about new money over and above that which Parliament has already agreed. The amendment will allow authorities to avoid injustice which they would otherwise suffer. That is fair enough.

I have it on the best authority that the delay to a supplementary report is not serious. For 1987-88 the grant entitlement of one authority is not affected by that of others. Therefore, each authority will know what change in grant it can expect to receive. I understand that it is quite common practice for the DOE and the Secretary of State to lay the supplementary reports before Parliament in the period before a new financial year, but only to implement the change once the year begins. That allows local authorities to budget for otherwise unforeseen grant changes. The timetable built into the amendment allows all that to happen.

I want to refer to the figures for one authority which would benefit from the amendment. Most of the figures used by the DOE for the purposes of the Bill for the year 1987-88—which is the year affected for which the accounts will be closed down, it is not the current financial year—come from the form RER89. That form contains budget figures for 1988-89 and the revised estimates for 1987-88.

Brent council had not submitted its RER89 form by 7 July 1988. No one would argue about that. Brent had agreed a total expenditure figure when it set its rate in March, but it was unable to decide how its budget should be split between the different service areas. Therefore it could not fill in all the form. No hon. Member needs to recite the financial difficulties that Brent has faced.

While Brent had agreed its total figure, it could not fill in the detailed form for the particular service areas. As it did not want to send off a partly filled in form, that form was not sent. Officials from the DOE telephoned Brent to find out the total expenditure figure for 1988-89 and asked for that to be confirmed in writing. Brent did not confirm the revised estimate for 1987-88, although the figure was available and provided to DOE officials orally.

Brent did not appreciate the significance of this until after 7 July. Its revised estimate as reported to the council in March showed a £5·9 million reduction in expenditure compared to the figure that the Government are using. Everyone realises that Brent council is making substantial cuts in its expenditure this year. However, as a result of the Bill the difficulties facing the councillors and citizens of Brent will be made even worse. That is because Brent will lose £8 million in grant that it reasonably expected to receive. The figures were calculated by Brent officials and agreed by the councillors. Councillors do not go round willy-nilly cutting services. However, they cut the budget by £5·9 million and are prepared to take the consequences and to fight their corner. I shall later deal with the detail about that.

5.30 pm

Brent councillors reasonably expected to receive £8 million in extra grant. That is part of what the debate is all about. The Government always tell councils to cut their expenditure below the level that they are planning and they will get more grant, more money pound for pound. The amendment would allow Brent to submit a statement certified by the district auditor saying that its latest estimates of expenditure for 1987-88 are lower than the Department of the Environment had assumed.

How many times have we heard local government Ministers—I exclude the present Minister who has not been long in post—attack Brent for spending too much and call upon it to reduce expenditure? Brent has done that and it is grossly unfair to penalise it to the tune of £8 million. We want the amendment so that Brent will be allowed to submit a statement of the sort that I have outlined. That would certainly remove the unwanted and unwarranted financial pressure on Brent council which is extremely hard pressed and suffering.

I recently read a heavyweight piece in The Independent written by some professor whose name I forget. The piece was about Brent but the writer did not say whether he was a ratepayer or lived there. However, he said that Brent needed financial help. He also made some political points and said that Brent had been badly treated over its finances.

Brent council continues to spend over £300 million a year. The borough spends more on social service day nurses than any other outer London borough. Its rent figure is about the same as the outer London average and, believe it or not, with all its problems Brent's pupil-teacher ratio is still above the national average. That is much to the credit of Brent councillors who have had to agree the latest budget. The level of service in all areas of Brent is still superior to any comparable Tory-controlled authority.

Brent council is prepared to be honest and to face the consequences of the problems that were left to the present administration. No one can point the finger at any single party, because Brent suffered greatly when it was run by a coalition of Liberals and Conservatives. That coalition left a considerable mess and balances of £37 million were cleared out before Labour took control. I must put the positive case for Brent. As long as I am responsible for speaking for the Labour party on local government matters I am not prepared to listen to unfair criticism of any local authority, Labour or Tory. Sometimes there is fair criticism but there has been a great deal of unfair criticism about Brent. In the view of many people, Brent is now bravely seeking to put its finances in order. It is grossly unfair that this legislation will result in Brent losing £8 million of Government grant.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Would my hon. Friend like to comment on the change of control of councils? He may be aware that a by-election last Thursday in Nottingham turned out the sitting Tory council, not least because of its mismanagement of Bradford and the Government's unpopularity in Nottingham. Would he like to say something about the change of control now that Nottingham has a Labour-controlled authority?

Mr. Rooker: My hon. Friend is right. In a debate in the House last week Nottingham figured almost as much as Bradford. A Conservative Member who is not present at the moment said that he knew Nottingham better than my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen). I understand that a Conservative majority of 400 was turned into a Labour majority of 600. The Labour candidate, now Councillor Clark to whom we send our congratulations, polled over 2,000 votes. The Democratic party candidate polled more votes than there are amendments on today's order paper from that party. He polled 89. It is to the credit of the people of Nottingham that they listened to our debate on Monday and took on board the arguments that we advanced about the Bill and its unfair treatment of the people there. They voted accordingly. I understand that today that decision will be translated into practical effect in the council chamber.

The Minister for Local Government (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): Would the hon. Gentleman like to comment on the by-election that took place in Hyndburn, one of the most marginal seats? In that by-election the Labour candidate was booted out by the Conservative candidate and the community charge was an important issue in the by-election. Would the hon. Gentleman speak in the same way about the people of Hyndburn, or are they backward compared to the people of Nottingham?

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I think that both sides of the Committee have had their say on this issue. Perhaps we could get back to the amendment.

Mr. Rooker: The difference is that everybody knew, because it had been made clear in the House during our debate last week, that the elections in that one ward were crucial to the control of the council. That adds greater weight to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North.

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): I understand that the casting vote is now in the hands of a Communist.

Mr. Rooker: Yes. He holds the distinguished flying cross, an honour he won in the battle of Britain. We live in a democracy and he was elected as a councillor. I do not see anything wrong in that. Does the hon. Gentleman see something wrong in it?

Mr. Patnick: I see no difference between that and the casting vote of the mayor of Bradford.

Mr. Rooker: At the moment, the mayor of Bradford is using two votes. I understand that each councillor in Nottingham uses one vote.

I should like to come to my final point on amendments Nos. 8 and 9. I am looking round to see if I can locate one of my hon. Friends but he does not appear to be here at the moment. Perhaps he will arrive before we conclude the debate. The revaluation of superannuation funds was raised on Second Reading and the Minister said that he would look at the matter. I do not know whether he will have anything to say about that in this debate. Amendments Nos. 8 and 9 cover police authorities, passenger transport authorities and, of course, local councils. We have some other matters to raise about superannuation funds and their effect.

I understand that some local authorities are in the process of taking decisions in good faith which affect the expenditure of block grant entitlement. I shall stick to one narrow point. Some authorities, which have undertaken interim revaluations on the superannuation funds, have taken account of reduced employers' contributions in the revised estimates. Other authorities decided not to take them into account until the position was clearer, but will have done so when closing their accounts. In the normal course of events those councils would probably not have closed their accounts for about another year.

The retrospective nature of the Secretary of State's statement of 6 July is causing difficulty. Amendments Nos. 8 and 9 rescue at least those decisions that were made prior to the Secretary of State's announcement. That is all that we are talking about here. Being dependent on the external auditors' certificate, the figures could not be open to manipulation by any of the authorities, and no authority is seeking to do that. The Government have to meet this point. I know that many of my hon. Friends who represent constituencies in the west midlands have received representations on this matter.

One of the difficulties that we are under is the nature of the Bill and the way that it is being rushed through all its stages. On a later amendment I have a point to make about a major authority which was unaware, for whatever reasons, of the effect of the Bill upon its operations until something like Thursday of last week. That is difficult to imagine, but nonetheless, that is the case, and millions of pounds are involved. I should like the Minister to look at amendments Nos. 8 and 9 in the context of those authorities where revaluations of superannuation funds have taken place. I know that in some cases there were objections from the Government earlier on. Any proposals will have losers and gainers, but there seem to be more losers than gainers in this proposal. Authorities tend to underspend against the estimates.

Mr. Gummer: I hope to help the hon. Gentleman. With the superannuation, there is a problem. Authorities could not have written back after this date a sum that would help them because a revaluation between the dates has been seen to be contrary to the law. Therefore, the amendments that he is proposing would not help authoritites in those circumstances. This was the point I was trying to discuss earlier. I agree that this is a complicated matter, but that point would not be met by these two amendments, although the hon. Gentleman is right to say that others might be.

Mr. Rooker: I take the Minister's point.

The seven west midlands district councils stand to lose some £25 million over three years if the Secretary of State fails to take account of the impact of revaluation. If the west midlands authorities are revaluing their pension funds contrary to law, then someone will have to point that out to them. They are unaware that the revaluation was contrary to the law.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I almost feel sorry for Ministers who are left to defend what they must know to be completely indefensible. If they have understood the facts and the arguments, they must surely know that the Bill contains matters that constitute a public scandal. If they were to walk out now and tell Cabinet Ministers to do their own dirty work, they would have the greatest sympathy and understanding from Labour Members.

The smokescreen for the Bill is that it will merely stop creative accounting or prevent unscrupulous councils getting around rules. That is irrelevant to the objections I have to it, because of the effect that it will have on my constituents as ratepayers of Cardiff city council and South Glamorgan county council. It is also irrelevant to the point of principle involved. Amendment No. 19, which I have tabled, is so tightly drawn as to make it impossible for any local authority that was the target of the Government's wrath to have the slightest chance of "getting away with it". The Secretary of State for Wales made a statement about the effects that the Bill will have on Welsh local authorities. When he and the Secretary of State for the Environment made their statements on 7 July, they must have known that they were not only breaking past promises, but acting illegally, and the Bill seeks simply to legitimise that illegitimate behaviour. That cannot be put too strongly.

Three quotations show how serious this is. The first comes from G. C. Thornton writing in "Legislative Drafting", the authoritative text book on this matter:

> "Retrospective laws offend against the general principle that legislation intended to regulate human conduct ought to deal with future acts and ought not to change the character of past transactions carried on upon the faith of the then existing law."

The Bill flies in the face of that principle.

5.45 pm

Lord Pearce, in a judgment in the other place in 1971, said:

> "the presumption against retrospection is not a technicality. It is a general rule of justice not dependent on forms of words. It is founded on a judicial preference, where choice is possible, for the reading which does not invalidate existing rights and obligations."

The Bill flies in the face of that principle.

The third and most telling quotation comes in the words of Professor Goodhart in the Law Quarterly Review of July 1950, who refers to principles that "few people would dispute":

> "The first is that the law should, as far as is reasonably possible, be certain and stable, and the second is that it ought to be general in character and not be altered in regard to particular individuals. Certainty is necessary so that men can have reasonable confidence that their plans for the future will no be subject to sudden unpredictable changes. If established rights are altered retrospectively then life becomes a double gamble because now both the past and the future become uncertain."

I should like Tory Members to mark the final part of this quotation:

> "No commercial community could hope to survive if such an element of chance were introduced into normal life."

Ministers are expecting local authorities to live with such uncertainties. The point is simple and basic—this Bill fails on both the counts set out in that quotation.

The Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, who replied to the debate last week, relied on being able to say that the local authority, in this case Cardiff, had plenty of time to get these figures in before 7 July. As I am sure that the Minister did not intend to mislead the House deliberately last week, I hope that she is now aware that what she said was inaccurate, and that she will take the opportunity today to put the record straight. I will set out the position simply and clearly, and ask the Minister or her colleague in the Welsh Office, who must be well aware that what she said last week was inaccurate, to confirm that what I say now is the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

I am referring specifically to Cardiff city council, and some of the details are similar to the cases quoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), although in our case, it is the Secretary of State for Wales and the Welsh Office who have to take responsibility and must account for the decisions. This is a cast-iron case. The city council provides the Welsh Office with details of its projected, estimated and actual expenditure on forms dispatched by the Welsh Office. In February 1988, form RER89 and a covering letter were received for completion. The form was to be returned by 25 March 1988. Paragraph 7 of the covering Welsh Office letter emphasises that the details need be only "The best estimates that can be made in the time available, as an informed approximation".

It goes on to say that the refined figures should be provided at a later stage.

When the form was being completed, the financial year to which it related had not ended; nor were final figures then available for all items of income and expenditure for the year. The hon. Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones), who, like me, has served on Cardiff city council finance committee, will confirm that accounts are closed only after all relevant information has become available. In the event, the completed form RER89 was an estimate of expenditure for the year based on budget figures and incomplete data based on such figures as were available —the normal and proper way to deal with such cases.

On 16 June 1988, the final accounts for 1987-88 were laid before the finance committee of the city council and approved. These showed that, whereas the city council's expenditure had been estimated in 1987-88 to be £23,694,500, actual council expenditure had been reduced to £22,396,876. That was the result of measures adopted by the city council to achieve savings in accordance with central Government guidelines and policy, and made on the basis of published grant figures and of statements made to the House by the Secretary of State for Wales. The result was that expenditure has been reduced by £1,297,624 from the budget figure. In accordance with the information then available, additional grants of almost £2,300,000 therefore became payable.

I want the Minister to take note of the date that I am about to give. On 29 June 1988, just one week before the statement by the Secretary of State for Wales—when the intention must have been known to Ministers and officials at the Welsh Office—the authority received form RO 1987-1988 and a covering letter. With the form was another form headed "Block Grant Claim Form 1987-1988". It was stated that that was the final block grant claim form and required certification by the chief financial officer and auditor. The earlier form had not required such audit certification or signatures. The covering letter stated that the form was to be returned by 31 July 1988.

In the past, Cardiff city council has always completed the RO form on the basis of actual expenditure—which has formed the basis of the audited accounts. The Welsh Office has always calculated the grant payable on the basis of the form and the actual expenditure of the city council.

There was no consultation or advance notification prior to the statement of 7 July. There was no suggestion that the form should be returned earlier than the specified date —that is, 31 July 1988. There was no warning that the basis on which the block grant was calculated would be changed from actual to estimated expenditure. The arbitrary and fundamental alteration of the basis for payment of the council's grant caused initial disbelief and then upset and dismay among everyone concerned with local government finances.

During the financial year, many hard decisions had been taken to ensure that the council did not exceed its budget figures. The expectation and understanding, based on the law and on the Government's announcement, was that by achieving economies the council would be entitled to an increased grant. Now, for no good reason related to the council's behaviour, and without prior notice, the Government seek to change the position after the event and deny the council those moneys. The council was misled in circumstances that were unreasonable, unfair and damaging to the integrity of proper public administration. Do the Government intend to cause such

Since 7 July, there have been efforts to put matters right. Civil servants were clearly embarrassed. The local authority believed that, when Ministers realised the impropriety of their decision, matters would be put right. I believe that hon. Members of all parties thought that Ministers would draw back from their decision.

I shall summarise the scandal in words of one syllable —I realise that the word "scandal" has two syllables, but I hope that most of the other words that I use will have one. One must bear in mind the assurance that was given in the House by the Secretary of State for Wales and by the Secretary of State for the Environment that actual expenditure—not estimated expenditure—would count in the calculation of the eventual RSG payment made to the local authority. One must also bear in mind that Cardiff city council had observed every requirement made by the Secretary of State, had kept within the targets set by the Secretary of State, had provided all the information that was required by the Secretary of State and had been reassured only days before 7 July that it had until the end of July to submit the form giving details of actual expenditure.

In the light of that rectitude, will Ministers seriously press ahead with these provisions? They should also bear in mind that Cardiff city council had gone further and had succeeded in keeping its expenditure below the target set by the Secretary of State, secure in his assurance that it would thus attract the additional £2·3 million grant to which I referred earlier. The council had gone far beyond the minimum certainty that the Secretary of State might have expected.

The council closed its account by 7 July. The accounts were approved by the finance committee and the full council by the end of June. The accounts had also been sent to the district auditor before 7 July—he can attest to that quite easily. The information was also sent to the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, in his capacity as one of the local Members of Parliament. That information had reached all local Members by that date—well before the date requested by the Welsh Office. Finally, the accounts were provided to the Welsh Office by the date requested on the form.

There is no doubt about the figures on which the Government ought to base their decision about the grant to Cardiff city council. The figures were in print and in the public domain before the Secretary of State's announcement on 7 July. They were with the district auditor, who can verify that fact. The figures had reached the local Members of Parliament, including the Under-Secretary of State for Wales, who is not only the Minister responsible but represents Cardiff, Central and whose constituents, as ratepayers, will be affected by the Government's appalling behaviour in this regard.

There is not only no creative accounting, there is no scope or possibility of creative accounting. There is no way in which those figures could have been tampered with after the statement given by the Secretary of State. Cardiff and South Glamorgan have such cast-iron cases that it will be a public scandal if the Minister does not accept my submissions. I call on the Minister and on the Under-Secretary of State for Wales to respond by accepting either my amendment or the slightly wider one tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). I call on them to put matters straight, to put them back into the area of public rectitude and to avoid what will otherwise be a public scandal.

Mr. Malcolm Thornton (Crosby): The hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) has raised what he called a fairly narrow point. My point could be described as even narrower as it is very much a technical matter.

The Merseyside residuary body has made representations to me that there is an expenditure figure in the 1985-86 RSG fourth supplementary report consultation paper which is not correct for rate support grant purposes in respect of Merseyside county council, which, as we know, is now defunct. If my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government can give me an assurance, I need not detain the House any longer. Can he assure me that, notwithstanding the proposed specified date of 6 July 1988, the residuary body will be given the opportunity to present the revised grant-eligible expenditure figure of £203·219 million in lieu of £204·186 million which the district auditor now suggests is not appropriate for grant purposes? Perhaps my right hon. Friend can state whether that assurance can be given.

Mr. Gummer: I must advise my hon. Friend that when I deal with the matter in rather more detail he will see that I will not be able to give the assurance that he seeks.

Mr. Thornton: In that case, perhaps I can give some further background information which might assist the Minister in the time between now and when he replies to the debate. I shall be brief, because these are technical matters but perhaps I can give the basic facts.

The accounting year in question is 1985-86, the final year of the former Merseyside county council. Because it was the final year, it was both prudent and necessary to bring in prior year adjustments amounting to £967,000 to reflect the county's closing position. It has been accepted by the Department of the Environment and confirmed by a letter dated 14 February 1985 that prior year adjustments should not have implications on the amount of rate support grant entitlement. In completing form RS1B, which is the block grant claim form, the district auditor made amendments which effectively included an inappropriate figure as a result of prior year adjustments for total expenditure for the year, which would involve the Merseyside residuary body in the loss of £1·4 million grant for the year.

The district auditor has now confirmed in a letter dated 28 October 1988 that the effect of the submitted RS1B is not in line with the DOE letter of 14 February and has suggested that the total expenditure figure should be reconsidered.

Further, on 26 August 1988, a Department of the Environment letter inviting views by 21 September 1988 on the proposed rules included an exemplification of the figures of total expenditure which will be used to calculate the block grant. That was the first occasion on which the Merseyside residuary body became aware that "an incorrect figure was in the possession of the Department of the Environment."

The letter was delayed beyond the response date by the postal strike, but, on receipt, an immediate response was made.

The facts concerning this narrow, technical point should persuade the Minister at least to allow the Merseyside residuary body the opportunity to present the amended figures. The figures were amended not by the former county council, nor by the residuary body, but on the advice of the district auditor, despite his original advice to include the figures in the submission. I should have thought that that in no way runs counter to the general thrust of the Bill and is a point well worth consideration.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): The hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) said that he would sum up the issue in words of one syllable. I wondered how he would manage that and he proved conclusively that we cannot sum up this issue in words of one syllable.

The Government are aiming in the Bill to prevent the continuation or deterioration of the lottery of rate support grant. The amendments—I have tabled amendments with a similar intention—would allow us to get away from one of the most unjust and harsh lotteries that the Government have introduced by their random choice of a cut-off deadline for those authorities affected.

The Association of County Councils has heard from 37 counties on the impact of the announcement. Most of the detailed information and complaints relate to 1987-88. The replies show a general underspend on revised estimates, meaning that the expenditure rules have led to a loss of grant. The estimated losses range from the very small right up to the figure of £9·7 million, which is far from being a small figure. Only three counties closed at 6 July figures. In addition to underspending, some authorities lost expected grant as their plans to reduce outturn through the use of balances were rendered irrelevant.

Four counties showed that the rules resulted in grant gains for them, largely owing to overspends on revised estimates. However, without the announcement, two of those counties would have sought means of reducing that overspend, so the Government's intentions have not been fulfilled. The largest gain by far is £8 million to one county, due to new accounting practices in preparation for the community charge. That is not just a lottery; it is like playing bingo. It does not require any serious thought or planning; the Minister merely requires the same skill as the bingo caller.

In addition, a number of specific points were made to the ACC. The part of the 7 July announcement to which authorities most object has consistently been the application of the rules to 1987-88. The Minister, in trying to defend what he has done, is most vulnerable on that point and should show the greatest flexibilty in responding to the points that have been made.

The 6 July deadline is quite simply unfair. There are many reasons for that, but I shall highlight just a couple. The 6 July date is close, but just prior, to the closedown date for many authorities. The Department of the Environment's deadline for outturn figures was 1 August. Therefore, even those authorities which had effectively closed down their accounts had no incentive to submit those final figures to the Department before 6 July. That can be seen in all authorities. West Somerset, the case quoted at great length by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), is just one example of the many authorities that have been caught out in this way. The underspends in 1987-88 are, to a great extent, genuine and not the product of any form of creative accounting. As the Minister must be well aware, many of them affect authorities wholly or partly controlled by the Conservative party.

I shall be brief, as these points have already been made very eloquently. The solution to the problems lies in the Minister's hands. He can deal with them effectively, through the amendments before us, through alternative amendments tabled by other hon. Members, including myself, or in ways that he and his civil servants can no doubt think up; but, at present, he shows no intention of recognising the unfairness and injustice of what he is doing. He would rather see a saving to the Treasury and have his civil servants given a little bureaucratic ease in their dealings than respond to the genuine needs and pressures of the authorities affected, whether they be Brent or councils controlled by the Democrats or the Conservatives. The effect of this lottery in the Bill is unfair. He can correct it, and I hope that he will tell us now that he will do so.

Mr. Gwilym Jones (Cardiff, North): I find myself in general agreement with the concern for the consequences of the case in Cardiff, mentioned by the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael), although he used far more extreme language than I want to use. We have a good case in Cardiff and I hope that it will not be affected by such extremist positions.

I do not much care for amendment No. 1. I find amendment No. 19 far more preferable, but both amendments are superior to the position in the Bill. I accept that he who sets the rules is entitled to change them whenever necessary. However the rules are changed—either through parliamentary legislation or through the Secretary of State acting under the proper authority of regulations—some form of consistency is desirable. When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State described the outcome of the rate support grant settlement in March 1987, he said:

"Ultimately the grant paid to a local authority in respect of the year will depend on what that authority actually spends."

He went on to say:

"I intend that the settlement for 1987/88 should give the further certainty of ensuring that each authority's grant entitlement will depend solely on its own spending decisions and not be affected by decisions taken by other authorities."

Many, if not all, of us should subscribe to that latter statement. Authorities should have the certainty of knowing that the outcome will be determined by their own spending decisions and will not be affected by the decisions of other authorities.

I am moved by the Cardiff case. That is not an example of creative accountancy. The books for Cardiff were closed well in advance of the key date, introduced this year, of 6 July 1978, but Cardiff will now receive a figure slightly different from that quoted by the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth. The council's director of administrative and legal services advises me that Cardiff stands to lose £2,127,000. However, whether we take the figure quoted by the hon. Gentleman or that quoted by the city council, it is no small sum for any district council and certainly not for the capital city of Wales.

Cardiff comes to be in that position because of an estimate form requested by the Welsh Office to be submitted by 25 March. That was not the formal return, giving accurate final figures, which was requested later, but an estimate that was requested before the end of the financial year. That was clearly an estimate and could only have been an estimate. Indeed, the covering letter asking for the form to be returned by 25 March advised councils to opt for speed rather than accuracy if a choice had to be made.

What opportunity does such an estimate give for creative accounting? There is no requirement to give hard figures. The authority can put down any figures that it chooses and even manipulate its own case depending on its view of the situation. As it is only an estimate, it can entail no responsibility on the part of the council. Certainly, it cannot be a proper basis to enshrine in legislation for the determination of grant for 1987-88. I have the greatest apprehension that this legislation cannot be the end of the matter, that there must be a distinct possibility of legal action and that we may find ourselves attempting to legislate again in the light of a court decision.

I very much doubt whether I shall be able to support the Government on this. I will listen closely to the debate, but I feel strongly about the way in which Cardiff is treated by the proposed legislation. As the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth pointed out, the accounts were closed before the new final date. The figures were properly submitted to my hon. Friend the Minister with responsibility for local government in Wales and I seek the important assurance today that those accounts, rather than any estimates, will be accepted as the final and crucial figures.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): I apologise to the Minister and to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) for missing their initial comments on the amendments as I was at a meeting to discuss Lords amendments to the Housing Bill, which will come before the House later this week. As a former member of Wigan metropolitan borough council, I served on both the finance committee and the policy and resources committee. Later I was also a member of the Greater Manchester fire and civil defence authority which I represent in the House on an honorary basis.

On Second Reading, I listened with growing incredulity to the Minister's responses and to the excuses given for the promotion of this legislation. When I returned to my constituency at the weekend, my incredulity turned to anger as a result of a meeting with elected members of the authority and its financial officer to determine the effects of the Government's proposals both on Wigan metropolitan council and on the Greater Manchester fire and civil defence authority. Wigan metropolitan borough council stands to lose £1·29 million in grant entitlement—a loss of a further £600,000 on the calculations given to it following discussions with the Department of the Environment after the Government's announcement of 7 July. Wigan council is particularly disappointed because many of the measures suggested for the reduction of expenditure last year and this year were not merely identified but actually met. Reductions were shown under many heads—housing, social services, leisure and education—but despite that, the Minister's statement will mean a major loss in terms in grant entitlement.

In reviewing this and next year's budgets, the authority did not act only in a political way. Joint meetings were held between the policy and resources committee and the management team to identify heads of expenditure under which improvements could be made without disrupting the level of services provided so as to meet the Government's requirements. That was done to the satisfaction not just of the local authority but of the Secretary of State. Indeed, the Under-Secretary of State has many times cited Wigan council at Question Time as an example of value for money in services, especially in relation to housing.

Earlier this year, the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Chope), met a deputation from the authority led by myself and my hon. Friends the Members for Wigan (Mr. Stott) and for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe). At that meeting, we identified a miscalculation by the Government of about £1 million in the authority's grant last year. It was also agreed that, to determine whether the grant provided was fair, officers from the Department should sit down with officers from the authority to consider the budget for the current financial year. Despite all that close scrutiny and involvement by the Department, no indication was given between the 7 July announcement and the 31 October statement that the authority would face such a major reduction in grant entitlement. The Minister cannot have it both ways. He cannot suggest that the aim of the Bill is to deal with the wide boys in local authorities when councils such as Wigan have sat down with officers from the Department to consider value for money in services provided but still face substantial losses in this and future years.

The authority has a difficult task ahead in trying to balance its budget. I hope that the Minister will tell me and my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) what advice he has for local authorities which have consistently followed statements made in the House and advice given by civil servants as well as advice given to regional authorities in discussions about both capital and revenue programmes but still find themselves with a major shortfall because the Government have decided to change the rules, not just part way through the year but almost at the end of the year. The Minister owes it to the ratepayers of Wigan, Cardiff and other authorities to make the position clear in relation to the level of services provided and the nature of the expenditure identified by those authorities as necessary for the continuation of those services without major disruption.

This measure has also greatly affected my authority's ability to deal with the capital cost this year and next year of introducing the poll tax arrangements. The Government's decision has merely rubbed salt in the wound, further reducing the grant available without reducing by a penny the imposed cost of introducing poll tax. Having considered the Government's proposals with officers from the Department, the authority identified its needs in terms of both capital and revenue in 1989 and 1990 for the introduction of poll tax. The Government have committed my authority to substantial capital allocations with revenue consequences.

As a result of the present proposals, the authority will have to rearrange its budget not just to meet current levels of services but in such a way as not to dislocate the intoduction of poll tax in terms of capital outlay, facilities provided and estimated revenue costs. Will the Minister assure the House that revenue implications for local authorities' capital expenditure—not capital allocations—will be included both in this year's estimates and in the rate support grant estimates for 1990-91? Without such an assurance, local authorities such as mine will face a shortfall of more than £1 million.

During the Second Reading debate last week, my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr highlighted the effects of the Bill on police authorities. However, there was little discussion of the fire and civil defence authorities in metropolitan areas. Like the police, they have been rate-capped, yet they are responsible for the services they provide to both the Department of the Environment and the Home Office. There is little manoeuvrability in either the budget or the level of services. The Home Office and the inspectorate set down the number of stations, the manning levels, the training levels, the purchase of equipment and what campaigns can be undertaken. All that is, quite rightly, tightly regulated because of the work done by the fire services. Whether in Greater Manchester, Cornwall, Essex, Sussex or Scotland—which I have occasionally visited—the fire services are professional and have minimum standards.

Despite assurances about the level of services given to the Home Office for this year and next, the calculated loss of grant for the Greater Manchester fire authority is £1·9 million. Before the Minister's arrangements of 7 July and his statement of 31 August, that authority expected to receive an additional £900,000 in block grant because of the steps taken to reduce its administrative costs and the level of precept levied. At the same time, the authority has maintained the level of services within the professional standards set by the Home Office. The Government's decision means a major loss of grant to that authority, and I understand that the same applies to Merseyside, west Yorkshire and South Yorkshire.

In view of the financial loss to the nation in major fires, it makes no economic sense to make large cuts in fire authority budgets simply because of the Government's accounting procedure. There will be no reduction in the number of fires or the hours that the men need to work. However, because of the loss of grant, the services will have to be provided on an increasingly reduced income base. One major fire in an industrial establishment in Greater Manchester, Merseyside or South Yorkshire can cost the nation £3 million, £4 million or £5 million. Surely even the Government understand the necessity for a professional fire service that is cost-effective in the real sense—not in the balance sheet at the Department of the Environment.

Mr. Patnick: On 31 October the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) said that South Yorkshire would lose £750,000. I wish to quote The Star —and, as I have said before, if something does not appear in The Star, it has not yet happened. On 3 November it stated:

"The average family in South Yorkshire pays just 61p a week for their police and fire services. For 38p, they get 2,912 uniformed police officers, backed up with 507 vehicles, while the 23p a week for the fire service gives them 1,077 full-time and 132 part-time firemen, 77 fire engines and other assorted rescue vehicles and tenders."

There does not appear to be any shortage of cash or manpower in South Yorkshire.

Mr. McCartney: That is because of the commitment given by the elected representatives of both South Yorkshire and Greater Manchester fire authorities which, despite the Government's rate-capping, through brilliant management and administration have maintained the level of fire services set down by HMI and the Home Office. I remind the hon. Gentleman that those services were under threat last year. A joint delegation from the fire and civil defence authorities, involving Conservative, Labour and Liberal Members and local authority representatives, came to see the Minister to sort out the discrepancy between the rate support grant arrangements made by the Department of the Environment and the maximum expenditure limits set by the Home Office, which were not compatible. The fire and civil defence authorities quite rightly took safety and professional standards to be the key words and worked to the maximum expenditure limits set by the Home Office and not the RSG limits set by the Department of the Environment. Had they not done so, there would have been major reductions in the number of fire fighters and in the level of services provided.

I remind the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) that both this year and last year the fire services in London have operated without a single penny of grant from the Department of the Environment. It is the only major capital city in the world whose fire service is being funded out of the pockets of its residents. I hope that Londoners will remember that at the appropriate time.

It is not just the Opposition who feel that these proposals are unsatisfactory. I wish to read a short extract from the most recent report of the Greater Manchester fire and civil defence authority's financial adviser. It is not a political appointment; he works on behalf of the precept payers to ensure that the authority remains within its capital and revenue budgets. He also advises the authority on the relationship between the Department of the Environment and the Home Office in the calculation of grant. That independent, non-political officer reported:

"If the Block Grant rules had not been changed then this Authority would have received some additional £0·900 million in Block Grant. It has been demonstrated to the Home Office, through the A.M.A., that the high rate of marginal grant loss has been considerably disadvantageous to this Authority and its Precept payers. In effect the 'goalposts' have been moved once more and the benefits of good housekeeping have been diminished. Additionally, there seems to be nothing now that the Authority can do to improve its 1988/89 entitlement."

Since that report, the Minister's announcement has meant not only the loss of that grant but a calculation that leaves the authority £1·9 million short. Surely it was not the Government's intention to introduce legislation that would financially cripple such an important service, especially as the level of services provided by each authority is set down in co-operation with the Home Office and HMI. The Greater Manchester fire authority did not take a political decision, and neither did West Yorkshire or South Yorkshire. It was an agreement set down under HMI standards.

I have served in Committee with the Minister, whom I found to be a reasonable man. He had the reputation of someone who went to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food not so much as a green politician but as someone who was to do the Prime Minister's bidding. His period in the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food caused him to change his mind. He became greener the longer he served in the House.

I hoped that the same would apply to this legislation. I am not sure whether the Minister wanted the job, but he was certainly given it following the previous Minister's mauling over the Housing Bill. I hoped that he would learn as quickly in his present job as he had to do at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Metropolitan or non-metropolitan authorities and fire authorities, whose budgets are already determined by the Home Office, try to provide value for money on a 12-month budget and, at the same time, look ahead to the next year. They consider the number and level of services provided and the way in which they are delivered. It makes no economic or social sense, part of the way through the year, despite negotiations with his Ministry, as the professional report indicates, for the Minister to move the goalposts. That is done to the detriment of rate and precept payers, without a single penny being added to the level or nature of services.

I hope that, even at this late stage, the Minister will see some sense and support the amendment, and stop the madness of continually treating local government as though it were a political football. People in the provinces are desperately trying to provide a level of service to maintain simple, decent standards of education, housing or fire facilities. They constantly bear a yoke imposed by the Minister and his predecessors. The Government are continually changing the rules and pinching substantial sums of money from ratepayers' pockets. At the end of the financial year, when local authorities set their next precepts, the Government blame local authorities for increases in rates and precepts. In the past six years we could have had reductions in precepts while maintaining services if the Government had maintained the level of grant that previous Governments provided.

As we have seen throughout the country, there has not only been a deliberate attempt by the Government to try to cripple the finances of local authorities but a devious attempt to blame local authorities for a deduction in services and opportunities that they provide for ratepayers. It is time for the Minister to come clean, get rid of this simple little Bill, and accept the amendment. If he does not accept the amendment, through no fault of their own, local authorities will be in financial chaos. By acting on the misinformation that was deliberately released during the summer by the Secretary of State and by civil servants in the Department of the Environment, this autumn, local authorities may find themselves with substantial reductions in grants that will directly affect the services that they provide to ratepayers.

Mr. Michael Lord (Suffolk, Central): I shall not speak for too long, because, although the relevant amounts of money vary, most hon. Members will speak about much the same issue. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State also represents a Suffolk constituency, so he will know about the things that I shall speak about concerning Suffolk county council. I have already quizzed him on some matters. I shall speak briefly about the Severn-Trent water authority v. Cakebread case. It is not strictly relevant to the debate, but it will have a major impact on the finances of Suffolk county council over the year ahead.

Mr. Gummer: As an amendment relating to Cakebread is to be discussed, perhaps it would be better for my hon. Friend to deal with it then.

Mr. Lord: I was about to say a few words about choosing the date of 7 July. I shall refer to the Cakebread issue at the appropriate time.

As we know, the date of 7 July was chosen in an arbitrary way. I am not quite clear why that date was chosen or why local authorities were given such a short time in which to respond. For Suffolk county council, the cost will be £2·5 million. For a county council that is fairly prudent in its financial dealings, that penalty is rather harsh.

I want to talk about Cakebread because I wish to draw the Committee's attention to the effect of retrospective legislation when it could be helpful and when it could be harmful to Suffolk county council.

For Suffolk county council, the total amount involved in the two issues—the Cakebread point which involves £1·9 million and the £2·5 million involved in choosing the date of 7 July—is £4·4 million. That will have a serious effect on the ratepayers. I know that my right hon. Friend is fair in such matters. Does he consider that this measure is fair and honest? Even at this late stage, will he give the matter further consideration?

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) in apologising to the Minister of State and to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) for having missed their speeches. I particularly regret missing the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr, with its stout defence of my local authority, Brent, which will be much appreciated.

I hope that, when the Minister replies, he will not be tempted to regard hon. Members' contributions as yet another basket of special pleadings. The matter involves much more than that. It goes to the heart of a provision in a Bill that is fundamentally unjust in its impact on local authorities and their budget-making processes. The Bill does not take into account the real difficulties that many local authorities of all political persuations are experiencing, not only in balancing their books, but in maintaining an adequate standard of service right across the board for local ratepayers and residents.

Therefore, the Bill should not be seen by the Minister in a narrow party way—as a way, yet again, of screwing local authorities. He should recognise it for what it is. I make a heartfelt plea to him to think again about the impact of the Bill on the hard-pressed ratepayers about whom the Government purport to be concerned. Hard-pressed ratepayers and residents will have to pay the price of the Bill if the amendment is not carried.

Sometimes there is a tendency to suggest that my local authority is faced with a problem that is entirely of our own making, and that the current crisis in the provision of services—a crisis that all too often hits those who are least able to defend and take care of themselves, those who are unemployed, those who are disabled, those who are elderly, those who, for one reason or another, are particularly dependent on local authority provision, just as much as it hits those who simply require the ordinary services such as refuse collection and the like that a local authority should provide for its residents—is entirely of the making of the Labour administration. That is simply not the case. When we ask the Minister to think again, it is against a backcloth of responsibility arising from decisions made by Conservative-Liberal administrations as well as by Labour administrations.

The problems faced by the current administration in my borough, like so many problems faced in our country today, can be traced back to 1979 when the present Government were elected. Since that time rate support grant in Brent has been reduced from some 65 per cent. of net borough requirements to 38 per cent. If the Government had continued to fund Brent at 1979 levels, the council would be receiving an additional £52 million in the current financial year.

The picture has been made that much more dire by decisions that cannot be attributed to the present Labour administration. The problem today would have been more manageable, although there would still have been a problem, had it not been for the irresponsible behaviour of the Tory-Liberal administration between 1983 and 1986. We then saw some £39 million of accumulated balances squandered to depress the rates artificially, particularly in election year. Massive problems were built up for the future. We have become accustomed in the House to seeing the national family silver squandered unacceptably, but in Brent we became accustomed to seeing the municipal silver disposed of in the same way, by the Conservative party.

I want to give the figures, because what we are discussing can ultimately be broken down into figures. In 1986—which just happened to be an election year—the Conservative administration constructed a budget that assumed rate support grant of some £45,320,300, more than £7 million of it from the GLC to pay for the levies of successor bodies and interest of some £1·5 million on balances that no longer existed, having been squandered. When the Department of the Environment came to make its own calculations, when the mysteries were worked out and the entrails pored over—for presumably that is what goes on in Marsham street, being about as scientific an approach as can be managed—the rate support grant actually paid proved to be some £38,580,200, with some £3,352,200 from the GLC. The projected interest on balances was a debit figure, because the Conservative party left the council without any balances

Coming into power in 1986, the Labour administration had to face a budget with a built-in deficit in excess of £14 million. The problem is graphically illustrated by the council's total revenue expenditure in 1986-87, the first year of Labour control. People can hardly be blamed for swallowing the myth of the high-spending, profligate Labour council. In the South Yorkshire Star, mentioned by a Conservative Member, if something does not appear it has not happened; in some papers that my authority has to put up with, if something appears we can be sure that it has not happened.

Mr. McCartney: They quoted the Chancellor today.

Mr. Boateng: Such are the depths to which certain papers will sink to build up a political bogey-person and act accordingly.

That myth of the high-spending Labour council is not borne out by the figures. The council spent £189,921,084. That was just £3,042,924 more than the Tory budget—an increase of 1·6 per cent., less than the the rate of inflation. There is your profligate, high-spending Labour council.

Since then the Government in their wisdom—again, presumably consulting the entrails—have continued to reduce their contribution to the council's budget, which has compounded the problem. We hear a great deal from Conservatives about creative accountancy, and of course we must be wary of it: no one pretends that it is to be entered into lightly or welcomed with open arms. We must, however, face the fact that the creative accountancy that we in Brent are now having to handle was introduced by the Tory-Liberal administration in 1987, and the exigencies of fortune have required a successor Labour authority to continue with it.

That is the truth. It is not some pie-in-the-sky figment of a rabid Left-wing imagination. The facts can be discovered by looking at the books, and I invite the Department to do just that. I ask the Minister to consult his advisers and to find out whether he can reasonably dispute any figure given in this debate by me or my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr. Those are the figures on which the Department is basing its assumptions about Brent's spending.

The background is made still worse by changes in Government regulations, often made at a moment's notice. I still hope that there is a glimmer, a sliver of a chance that the Department may yet think again about this charge, because of the weight of representations received from local authorities, again of all political persuasions. The Minister will know only too well the impact on authorities of the announcement of the change in the method of subsidy for homeless families. That cost my authority a little under £4 million at a stroke—at a grimace from the Secretary of State. Many of us remember the afternoon, and the spirit in which, it was announced. I am afraid that the spirit was much closer to vindictiveness and glee than to any genuine concern about the impact of the decisions on homeless families.

We hope that the Secretary of State will reconsider, but the local authority has already had to respond to the circumstances. It has made some difficult decisions that have been painful for my constituents, and very painful for disabled people like those whom I met only a few days ago at the Stonebridge training centre. Trainees there, many of them suffering from Down's syndrome, are able to make a small contribution to the working economy by putting together packets of cosmetics which are then used in hotels. They gain considerable satisfaction from so doing. Above all, they gain a sense of their own worth and value by being paid £4 a week, the meagre amount that they are allowed without falling foul of the social security benefit system. As a result of the last round of cuts forced on my local authority by this Government, that £4 was removed. What does one say to those people? There are so many of them.

People find that their local library, such as the one in Kensal rise, is to be shut. They are forced to fall back on the generosity, which one hopes will be forthcoming, of All Souls which has a traditional and long-standing relationship with that library. All Souls bequeathed it in the first place and it was opened by Mark Twain. People are forced to fall back on that sort of private charity to keep the library open because the local authority, subject to current restraints, cannot do so. So it goes on and on. The number of teachers in schools throughout my constituency has been reduced. Social service night duty has been cut, so now there is no official night duty service. One can imagine the impact of that on some of the most deprived and at-risk families and children.

That is just a sample for the Minister. I urge him to ensure that those we advise him examine what the impact will be on the ground. What else do they want us to cut? Have we yet reached the stage when the DOE can come and say, "Cut this, cut that, cut the other," so that at least it can take the blame for the decisions which local authorities are being forced to make?

One of the great evils of the rate support grant system is the way in which the blame is transferred to local councillors and the Government walk away from the problems and turn their back on the people. That is unacceptable, whether in a Labour, Liberal or Democrat —whatever the party is called now—Conservative or hung local authority.

If the Bill is not amended as my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr suggests, its impact on my local authority will be a retrospective clawback of £8·8 million. There is no way that that money can be clawed back without either a rate rise of about 8 per cent. over and above any increase already agreed in the budget-making process—it was hoped to keep increases to a bare minimum—or a further round of cuts. In my constituency neither the voluntary organisations nor the residents and ratepayers find the burden of another round of cuts acceptable. The existing round has already had an unacceptable impact on them and the quality of their lives.

I cannot stand by and watch the Government force the local authority to make cuts in order to obey the law. I do not see how the imposition of an additional rate burden of 8 per cent. on my constituents as a result of the machinations at Marsham street can be justified. Why should already hard-pressed people suffer, as a result of this legislation, which is designed ostensibly to reduce the burden of rates on them, a further increase and burden?

I ask the Minister to think again and to be prepared to come with his civil servants to meet my local authority and me to explain how it will be possible to manage the local authority budget within the constraints that the Bill will impose. I ask him to think again and to respond positively to the pleas from both sides of the Committee for the amendment.

Mr. Gummer: We have had a useful debate on this good set of amendments. They put before the House the various possibilities before the Government in trying to arrange for the transitional period from our present system to a future one. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr

[Mr. Gummer]

(Mr. Rooker) rightly said that we do not want to go over the debates that we had earlier, but he made one point which I should like to discuss with him and which we should put right on the record.

Some time ago, I came to these discussions to try to find the best way to face this issue. Although I inherited the debate and the announcement——

Mr. Rooker: It is somebody else's fault.

Mr. Gummer: I am merely saying that I inherited this matter, so naturally I looked at it with care. Therefore, what I have to say is the fruit of trying with an open mind to see what it is best to do.

Naturally, there are many attractions in having the other dates which have been suggested and I shall deal with each case on the basis that it will probably cover a reasonable cross-section of local authorities. Common to all the cases is the fact that they are the cases of local authorities for which another date would have been preferable. They are not cases of local authorities which would suffer by having another date. [Interruption.] I am trying to approach the hon. Gentleman's point with considerable care. I took what he said seriously and I hope that he will do the same with my comments.

Whatever the date, the authorities that wish us to choose another date are always those which are discommoded by the date. One does not hear of the authorities which benefit from the date and would be discommoded by another date.

Mr. Michael: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Gummer: No. When I come to deal with Cardiff, the hon. Gentleman will undoubtedly want to question me closely. I do not want to run away from any of the specific points which he raised.

In our original debate, I recognised that, whatever we did, some local authorities would be put out by the date that we chose. I also said that they would not necessarily be controlled by Opposition parties. The hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) asked that we should not consider this in a narrow party way, and I wish to make it clear that there is no question of this date being harder on authorities of one political persuasion than another. That is not the case, and I hope that he will take that from me. However one chooses these dates, it is not a question of picking out one particular party for benefit, so I have to look at the individual cases.

I understand the West Somerset case. The hon. Member for Perry Barr is right in the sense that West Somerset is likely to lose by this date compared with what it might have lost if another date had been chosen. It is true for any date that some will lose and some will gain. The question then is, who should be blamed for it. If there were no possibility of creative accounting and if we could reach agreements with all authorities on a fair basis, we could undoubtedly be more flexible.

I fear that it is not the Government that West Somerset must blame. Over the years, several authorities have behaved in ways which were inconceivable in the past. They have taken it on themselves to determine what the national figure for spending should be by seeking to take from the pool more than they should under the rules or any sensible sense or spirit of the rules. If West Somerset asks who should be blamed, I would reply, "Authorities that have used methods of calculation of their grant requirement and expectation that decent authorities would not have used." I do not include all authorities in that, and I certainly do not say that of Cardiff.

The hon. Members for Perry Barr and for Brent, South mentioned Brent council, which is an important case that I should consider carefully. The first suggestion is that, if we had chosen another date, Brent would have done better than it has. The second suggestion that has been carried all the way through is that we should be careful about Brent because, although it has been badly reported in the newspapers, it has done its best and we are being unfair.

I wish to consider Brent as fairly as possible. I have listened to the hon. Members' figures, but the House should be aware that those figures were available to the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone). Having examined those figures, he said that Brent council—controlled by the Labour party—reminded him of the Pol Pot regime in Cambodia. It is at least open to the House to take a different view of the way in which Brent council has handled its affairs from the one put forward by the hon. Member for Brent, South. Two Labour Members in adjacent constituencies represent the council, first, as a paragon of virtue and, secondly, as probably the worst council that ever existed. We start with a pretty even-minded view from the Labour party, and I shall try to be as moderate as I can in my response.

Mr. Boateng: To call my local authority a paragon of virtue would be somewhat over-egging the pudding, but when has the Minister ever taken seriously a word said by my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone)? For him now to rely on something said by my hon. Friend to a newspaper as an indictment of my local authority, and a reason for him not to treat it sympathetically, is trying it on a bit.

Mr. Gummer: I thought that I had introduced the point in the most moderate way possible. I merely suggested that there was disagreement—I put it no stronger than that—between two members of the same political party about the character of the local authority that they represent. I have tried to look for the facts.

Of course I take seriously the views of the hon. Member for Brent, East. That is why I spent much time opposing them in London. His views were so serious as to be worth considerable opposition. In those days, the hon. Member for Brent, South was a great supporter of his hon. Friend and commended his views to us. He fought—not in this place, but elsewhere—for the retention of the body of which the hon. Member for Brent, East was leader so that those views could be imposed not just on Brent but on all of Greater London.

Mr. Boateng: I commended my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East when he was leader of the Greater London council, and was glad to serve under him. I commended him as an expert on the affairs of London, not as a political commentator on nasty regimes in south-east Asia. As a commentator on political regimes in south-east Asia, seeking to draw analogies between them and local authorities in London, my hon. Friend is not necessarily a man on whom the Minister can rely to bolster his very weak argument.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Member for Brent, East was not comparing the Pol Pot regime with the local council in Brent. He was comparing the local council in Brent with the Pol Pot regime.

Mr. Rooker: We asked the Minister to consider the figures for Brent, not what I or my hon. Friend may have said. The Minister is making great play of this point. The leaders of Brent council made a substantial, detailed, four-page reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone). It would be in no one's interest for me to place it on the record, but its response to the comparison with the Pol Pot regime was that it was "dishonest, opportunistic and mendacious". Will the Minister explain why Brent, having taken the courageous decision to balance the budget and make cuts, will suffer a further cut of £8 million?

Mr. Gummer: As there seemed to be a disagreement about this in Brent, I was trying to establish that we should examine the figures carefully, and that is what I shall do.

The first fact is that the rate in Brent is the second highest in outer London. In 1988-89, its reported figure of total expenditure is 11·5 per cent. above the needs assessment, not taking into account the spending financed by creative accounting. We have always said that we should consider not only the amounts of money that people lose, but the amounts of money that others gain. Although it is true that, if we had chosen another date, Brent might have been about £8 million better off than it appears to be under this arrangement, Opposition Members have not mentioned the fact that, as a result of the forthcoming supplementary reports, Brent will gain an extra £9·4 million. We must set that gain against any reduction. The hon. Member for Brent, South must accept that those two facts should be considered together and that the rate increases that he feared will probably be unnecessary.

I am trying to examine the matter as fairly as I can, but it is difficult to take Brent's claim seriously. The hon. Members for Brent, South and for Perry Barr explained the problems. London authorities do not have the easiest of wickets, but the truth is that the figures that we should have received on 29 February were still outstanding on 12 May, although some figures were given on the telephone. On 17 May, Brent promised to send the form by the Whitsun weekend. On 7 June, having been telephoned again, the council said that it hoped to send the form by Friday 17 June. On 20 June, the council said that it was having difficulty finalising the figures, but it telephoned back to give another figure. On 21 June, we wrote confirming one figure and asked for the form to be returned as soon as possible.

We cannot deal with an authority that does not appear to be able to do what every other authority—bar one—has done. I do not wish to repeat stories from newspapers, and I have been careful not to do so, but it is extremely difficult to deal with an authority that appears not even to know who are its council tenants and who are not, and which admits that it is beyond its power to find out, except on a sample survey basis. The hon. Member for Brent, South mentioned cuts, but any independent observer of Brent —I leave aside him and the hon. Member for Brent, East —would say that the cuts were introduced in so incompetent, extreme and haphazard a manner as to cause as much damage as possible, although the council could have done many other things.

I shall give hon. Members an example. At the same time as cutting the number of teachers in schools, Brent is recruiting teachers in Ireland. How can one deal with an authority which deals with its own electorate in that way? The hon. Gentleman said—I wrote this phrase down because I wanted to quote it—that we should be concerned with the unemployed, the elderly and those who are particularly dependent upon the local authority. I believe that we should be. However, given that, roughly speaking, Brent is about £1 million better off under the arrangements so far announced, the hon. Gentleman would do better if —perhaps in a less unattractive way than his next-door neighbour—he brought home to Brent the fact that the real answer would be for Brent not to complain about this and about the extra gains from the supplementary report, but to get its act together and run the system properly.

It does not matter what happened in the past, and the hon. Gentleman did not mention the period in which the present authority was run by an apparently more extreme group. If Brent does not do this, there will be statements in the newspapers daily—which it does not appear to be able to deny—which show that there are apparently people in Nigeria who can buy the keys to council properties in Brent.

Brent cannot honestly be used as an example of the sort of authority for which the whole system must be rewritten. I believe that it is the sort of authority that has to get its house in order. When it does so, no doubt we can take more seriously the views of the hon. Member for Brent, South and forget the comparison with the Pol Pot regime, which I agree with him was rather overstated. I am sure that anyone who has any real acquaintance with the Pol Pot regime would not suggest that there is any comparison, because the local authority in Brent has not gone out to kill people. However, it has failed to carry out its obligations as an authority and it would be better for the hon. Gentleman to consider those points.

Having dealt with Brent, where I do not believe there is a case, I must deal with a much more difficult case. I say to the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) that I do not know of any date on which there would not be a case such as that of Cardiff, South and Penarth. I say that, too, to my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North (Mr. Jones). Wherever there is a stocktaking line, there will be at least one or perhaps more authorities which will say to us, "Look, we are especially hard it, because we have done everything that you wanted us to do except that we have not quite met the obligations that you have made, so can we change it slightly?"

That is the problem of all the other amendments put forward by the hon. Member for Perry Barr. Each one of those amendments suggests that, for apparently good reasons, the goal posts should be moved slightly, but each one of them provides us with what I would call a Cardiff, South and Penarth situation, because there will always be one or more which will appear to fall just outside the line that is drawn. Therefore, I must justify to the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth why this line seems to be a better one than others, and then I shall explain to him why I do not believe one can take a particular view of his authority.

Using this line, we know exactly where we are from that point. No authority claims that we have interpreted our own rules in a way which produces the wrong figure. We know exactly where we are. It enables local authorities to make their plans for the future much more effectively, and it makes that transit possible. The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) may yawn, but I am trying to answer the specific cases—which I am sure he would have heard if he had been here—of the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth, who has made an important point, which I hope I am dealing with as carefully as possible.

The problem is that any other date would raise all kinds of arguments, which would mean that the argument of the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth and that of my hon. Friend the Member for Cardiff, North would become multiplied. I say to the hon. Gentleman that it is a date which does not serve Cardiff well. It means that, had we chosen another date, Cardiff would have been able to benefit from the cuts that it has made. However, what worries me is that almost every other authority in his area reflected such cuts in the figures that they put in.

Mr. Michael indicated dissent.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman shakes his head, but I have been careful about checking this. However, if I am wrong, I shall apologise to him. As I understand it, almost all the cuts which we are talking about could have shown up at the date that the figure was sent in. The chief financial officer signed the document as being the best estimate available at the time. I find it difficult to believe that those cuts were started, continued and completed between the form being sent in and the date which he now says, if he had only put in the next form early enough, he could have reflected them. I must say that that does not appear to be likely. Therefore, although I understand that Cardiff will be unhappy about this—I am sorry that that will be so—it must be true if there is a cut-off date of any kind.

It appears to me that, if I move in the direction of the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth on this issue, that I must then talk about the contribution made by my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mr. Thornton), about the Merseyside residuary body. He has already explained that the problem there is that there is an argument between the auditor and the authority. Until that argument is solved, we do not even know the basis upon which the authority would like us to choose between the two figures, both of which have been given to us—the earlier figure which it appears now to want us to take or the later figure that we have taken because we have said that we would take the later figure. That is the same kind of problem as that of the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth. I believe that there is no way round having a date, and with any date, if he were not the one who was asking me this point, I would have to answer other hon. Members who would be putting forward their points.

Mr. Michael: I hope that I can assist the Minister by providing exactly the sort of suggestion that will meet his requirements. The Minister knows full well that the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Secretary of State for Wales said in the House that the figures that would count would be those for the actual expenditure rather than those for the estimated expenditure by an authority. As the Minister must know, he refers to a form that deals with estimated rather than actual expenditure. The Minister's reference to the so-called choice of dates clouds the simple point that I shall make once more.

The Government had already chosen their date and the Government are seeking in the Bill retrospectively to change their date without any regard to principle or reason. The Government's date was 31 July. That was set in the letter from the Welsh Office dated 29 July. That letter could have specified 6 July, but instead it specified 31 July. My only plea is that, having made a promise, the Government should stick to it and, having chosen a date on which others relied as they were meant to rely, the Government should stick to it.

Mr. Gummer: In order to support that line, the hon. Gentleman quoted two authorities, one which said that we needed to be careful about retroactive laws in order to be sure that we are certain and stable, and, secondly, as Professor Goodhart said, the law should be general and not designed for one particular person. This date has been chosen in order to be certain and stable, because if we did what the hon. Gentleman suggested, it would give people the opportunity retroactively to change what had happened in the past by creative accounting. It is not that his local authority might do so, but that many other local authorities would.

Mr. Thornton rose——

Mr. Gummer: I do not think that I should give way, because there are a number of debates to come and I have been speaking for some time, but I shall do so for the last time.

Mr. Thornton: My right hon. Friend has said that, on Merseyside, there is a disagreement between the district auditor and the residuary body, but that is not the case. The disagreement concerns the interpretation of the Department's figures. In a letter from the district auditor to the Merseyside residuary body dated 28 October it states clearly:

> "It would appear, therefore, that whilst the RS1B submitted to the department accurately reflects the accounts which were presented in accordance with accepted practice . . . the effect has been for the DoE to treat the prior years adjustments as having implications for block grant entitlement which is not in accordance with the DoE letter of 14 February 1985."

My simple plea is that we allow the residuary body to submit its figures in line with the Department's accustomed practice.

Mr. Gummer: There is a disagreement between the auditor and the local authority, which continues. We said, for the benefit of all local authorities, that we would take the last figure given to us and that we would not argue that we should take the smallest or the largest one. We said that we would take the last one, as we said that that would be the one most likely to be of help to a local authority.

Mr. Gwilym Jones rose——

Mr. Gummer: No, I will not give way. [HON. MEMBERS: "Give way."] I have already said that I will not give way.

I believe that the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) should look at the figures in the round because quite a few of them will show that his comments have been unfair.

The hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) put the case for Wigan, which is likely to lose £48,000 on closedown. The hon. Gentleman did not mention, however, that, on the total supplementary report, Wigan is likely to gain £725,000, which is important. When the hon. Gentleman makes his case about the sadness and difficulties of Wigan he must take the figures in the round. In that way it is clear that Wigan will gain substantially and lose marginally.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the Greater Manchester fire and civil defence authority and said that it would lose money. I believe that he got the million in the wrong place, but I accept that, if that authority had given the best answer that it could, it is likely that it might have got an additional £900,000. If one considers the forthcoming supplementary report, however, one sees that the Greater Manchester fire and civil defence authority is set to gain £1·6 million. Therefore, far from being a net loser, that authority is a net gainer.

Mr. McCartney rose——

Mr. Gummer: I refused to give way to one of my hon. Friends, so I must refuse to give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. McCartney: On a point of order, Mr. Walker. Is it not the tradition of this House that, if a Minister names an hon. Member, that Member is then given the opportunity to respond?

The Chairman: It is entirely a matter for the Minister whether he gives way or not.

Mr. Gummer: There will be other occasions tonight on which what the hon. Member for Makerfield has said can be raised again. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will accept that I have given way most generously, and that I must press on.

I accept that there is a problem about Suffolk, which will lose money because of the proposed date. My hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) should consider that, if any of the other suggested dates were chosen, other authorities would lose and would argue that another date should be chosen—I accept that what happens to other authorities may not be as embarrassing to him and me.

In future, it is unlikely that, overall, there will be any gain for the Treasury. It is much more likely that, in terms of total grant, the local authorities will benefit year to year in a way that will gain the approval of my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central. I realise that Suffolk has a particular difficulty, but I cannot see how I can do something for Suffolk without producing something for other authorities which are just outside its area.

I do not believe that any of the amendments tabled by the Opposition will help us out of the problems that are bound to arise when one moves from one system to another. There is a need for a stocktaking date, and I believe that the proposed one is fair and absolutely clear. It means that we can start the new system in a certain manner so that people know where they are. I do not believe that any alternative date or method would achieve that end. For the benefit of all local authorities, I believe that it would be better to stick to the proposed date than to go with any other more complicated system that would only produce further difficulties.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): The Minister has done nothing to explain why the Government have chosen a particular date or why they should penalise local government through the rate support grant allocations.

It has been made abundantly clear that the Minister is not aware of what is taking place or what has been said in the debate. Even the hon. Member for Crosby (Mr. Thornton) had to remind the right hon. Gentleman that his response was misleading and that the issue that the hon. Gentleman had put to his right hon. Friend had not been addressed in his reply. At no time has the Minister said why 7 July has been chosen as the cut-off date, which the Minister has described as a fair date.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) gave five examples of how the Government and the Department of the Environment could consider the problems facing authorities. My hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) has already referred to the Greater Manchester fire and civil defence authority, on which he used to serve, which will lose nearly £1 million. During the two years in question my authority of West Yorkshire could lose £700,000 because of the cut-off date. The Minister should be aware of the problems that will face local authorities and joint committees because of his Department's action, which will stop all consideration of approved expenditure by local authorities after 7 July.

The Minister did not address any of the five suggestions put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr. I believe that it is unfair to bulldoze the Bill through without giving fair consideration to the issues involved in the amendments.

Reference has been made to West Somerset. The Minister said that those ratepayers should know who to blame if their rates increased because of a reduction of £133,000 in rate support grant. That is what they will suffer because of the cut-off date proposed by the Secretary of State. I hope that the ratepayers of West Somerset will realise, in common with the ratepayers of many other local authorities, that the real reason for the increase in rates lies with no other person than the Secretary of State.

A letter sent by the Secretary of State to his right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) said:

"I do of course understand the disappointment of authorities, like West Somerset, which have spent less in 1987-88 than they had previously reported to the Department but will not now gain any extra grant as they had expected to do".

7.30 pm

Therefore, the Secretary of State admits that there is disappointment and that such local authorities are being unfairly treated. They agreed to the terms set by the Secretary of State, but now they are being told that they will not be compensated for meeting the criteria set by the Department.

We believe that the amendments will redress the imbalance that local authorities will suffer if the Bill is passed. I draw the attention of hon. Members, particularly those who have not been here thoughout the debate, to the fact that contributions from both sides of the Committee have all been critical of the Bill. I hope that Tory Members who are here for the Division will note that their colleagues are dissatisfied with the way in which the Bill is being applied to local authorities. I hope that all hon. Members will support the amendment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Mr. O'Brien: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 20, at end insert—

'( ) Before making a calculation and notification under section 66(2) of the 1980 Act the Secretary of State shall take into account any reduction in a local authority's rateable value effective from the date on or before that which is relevant for determining the gross rateable value of the hereditaments in the authority's area under Part VI of the 1980 Act'.

The amendment requests the Secretary of State to consider the vast reductions in the rateable value of local authorities before the effective date set out in the Bill. It requires the Secretary of State to take into account reductions in rateable values when determining an authority's final grant entitlement. It will provide local authorities with financial compensation for the large refunds of rates which they have been required to make as a result of two recent rating cases, the Addis v. Clement House of Lords decision and the Severn-Trent water authority v. Cakebread Court of Appeal case.

Addis v. Clement turned on a decision whether a factory on the borders of the lower Swansea enterprise zone could rely on the introduction of the enterprise zone to seek a reduction in rateable value on the grounds that the favourable treatment on rates for companies within the zone depressed rateable values immediately outside the zone. That matter causes concern wherever an enterprise zone operates. On that occasion the House of Lords found that ratepayers could obtain changes in rateable values to reflect changes in market conditions. That decision was contrary to the traditional view and it caused problems.

The case of the Severn-Trent water authority v. Cakebread affected the rating of individually rated water hereditaments particularly sewage treatment works. The Court of Appeal held that, because the Water Act 1973 changed the statutory definition of water hereditaments, separately rated water hereditaments should be covered by the statutory formula governing the rating of water undertakings even though the formula made allowances for them in its original state.

That decision was taken on 4 December last year and many repayments were made before 7 July, the magical date in the Bill. The Appeal Court judgment excluded hereditaments around water undertakings from rating. Apart from the changes proposed in the Bill, we can imagine what results the Appeal Court decision has had and will have on local authorities' rateable value assessments.

On 9 March, the Secretary of State announced that he intended to legislate to overturn the decisions of the House of Lords and the Court of Appeal and restore the law to its previous standing. His proposals were subsequently enacted in the Local Government Finance Bill which was before the House a few weeks ago. Local authorities were worried that the restoration of the law was effective only from 10 March. Successful appeals by ratepayers prior to 10 March, some going back to 1984-85, were allowed to stand. That resulted in some authorities having to pay large rate refunds, with a consequent reduction in rateable values. That is the backcloth to the amendment.

During the passage of the Local Government Finance Bill the Association of London Authorities supported amendments to the Secretary of State's proposals about retrospection. If accepted, those amendments would have avoided the need for authorities to make refunds. Having failed in that approach, the association sought compensation through the rate support grant system. Further representations to the Secretary of State appear to have fallen on deaf ears.

A letter from the Department of the Environment to the Association of County Councils refers in detail to the Severn-Trent water authority v. Cakebread. The letter is dated 3 October and I shall quote from it because it is important and pertinent to the amendment. The letter says:

"The Local Authority Associations have made representations to the Department about the consequences for local authorities of the decision of the Court of Appeal in this case. In short, they argued that authorities would have to refund substantial amounts of rate income, and that this would have an unreasonable effect on their financial position. They therefore argued that the Secretary of State should make some arrangements to compensate them through the RSG system or otherwise.

Ministers have carefully considered these arguments. As you will know, the law has been amended so as to restore the position to that which was understood to operate before the Cakebread decision as regards valuation proposals submitted after 10 March 1988. It has also been made clear by the legislation that section 9(2) of the General Rate Act 1967 has no application to these cases, and this has substantially reduced the maximum amount which the Water Authorities might have been able to reclaim from local authorities. Ministers do not, however, intend to bring forward any proposals to modify the existing RSG arrangements so as to provide any additional Exchequer resorces."

That means that the Department emphatically turned down the request from local authorities for compensation for the loss of rateable value as a result of the court decisions. The amendment refers to the period before 10 March and pertains to decisions which influenced local authorities to make refunds.

Current legislation provides for special arrangements in cases where local authorities have suffered a reduction in rateable value. The ceiling for that is that it must be more than 2·5 per cent. of the rateable value. Section 67 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 empowers local authorities to apply to the Secretary of State for grant to be recalculated. Unfortunately, no authority met the rateable value criteria that resulted from the Cakebread and Addis cases.

The reduction in rateable values and the consequent liabilities to make refunds are significant. It is estimated that local authorities will have to refund no less than £90 million as a result of the Cakebread decision and between £30 million and £40 million as a result of the Addis case. The decisions have created tremendous problems for many authorities. I shall give some examples of the reductions in rateable values as a result of the decisions. The rateable value in Newham was reduced by £957,700.

In Trafford it was reduced by just under £500,000, in Sutton by £269,000, in Bradford by £212,700 and in Sheffield by £200,600. The rate refund paid by Newham was £2·3 million. Bradford paid £2·1 million, Wakefield £1·6 million, Bexley just over £1 million and Calderdale £692,000. Most of the money was paid before 10 March.

The Secretary of State should consider the problems facing local authorities. In addition to the refunds, they have to face cuts in rate support grant because of the cut-off date of 7 July. One can understand why local authorities are distraught. They also face a further reduction because no compensation will be paid for the fall in their rateable values.

This amendment would allow reductions in rateable values to feed through into grant entitlement, thereby providing some compensation for those authorities most seriously affected. I have already listed a number of those authorities. I ask the Minister to take into consideration the appeals that have been made by the various local authorities, and to agree that some consideration be given to the authorities that are most affected because of the decisions that have been taken.

The amendment is a genuine approach to try to resolve a serious matter. It does not try to score points or steal any ground from the Secretary of State. It tries merely to redress the imbalance. We heard a great deal in the last debate about cuts in services, and about how local authorities and those who serve on local authorities have had the traumatic experience of trying to meet the budget. Without any shadow of doubt, over the past nine years, local authorities have suffered tremendously because of Government decisions. The amendment will help to make some adjustment to the problems that are facing certain local authorities because of those decisions. I ask the Committee to accept amendment No. 2 because of its fairness and because it points out an anomaly that has arisen as a result of the decisions taken by the Secretary of State.

Mr. Lord: These amendments are linked to the group that we discussed with amendment No. 1, because of the power of the Government in both cases to put right what are seen as unfairnesses. I shall speak about the effects on county councils of the case of Severn-Trent Water v. Cakebread, with particular reference to Suffolk county council. I shall not rehearse the arguments, because the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) has laid out the position fairly clearly. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary will not disagree with at least the framework of the way in which he laid down the case.

The result of the case is that Suffolk county council will have to repay £1·9 million to Anglia Water through no fault of its own. Clearly, that has a great impact on the rate level for next year and the way that the whole rating package is put together. The council would like the Government to introduce retrospective legislation so that it does not have to pay out this embarrassing amount of money. The Government are saying that they are not able to do that, but in another part of the Bill, they are doing just that. They are employing retrospective legislation to establish figures for the rate support grant for the forthcoming year, and by doing so, and by choosing in a fairly arbitrary way the date of 7 July, they are penalising Suffolk county council to the tune of £2·5 million. That means that Suffolk county council will lose a grand total of £4·4 million.

The Government cannot have it both ways. They should either allow retrospective legislation so that Suffolk county council does not have to meet the £1·9 million charge to Anglian Water, or they should not use retrospective legislation to calculate the rate support grant figures for the years ahead. There is a great anomaly. I am not talking about levels of services or levels of rates. I am talking simply about honesty and fairness in Government dealings. In this case, it is patently obvious to everyone that things have not been done as fairly as they ought to have been. I ask my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary, as I asked my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government earlier, to consider my remarks and those made by every other hon. Member tonight, and to see whether justice and fairness can be done so that these unfair penalties do not fall on county councils such as mine in Suffolk.

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): I am in the unusual position of agreeing not only with what my hon. Friend the Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) said from the Opposition Front Bench but with what the hon. Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) said. I wish to place on record the grave concern with which Staffordshire county council views the Cakebread case and its results. Like those councils mentioned by my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Suffolk, Central, the Staffordshire county council is being badly penalised. There is an anomaly and the Government have it in their power to do something about that anomaly. There is no problem in the Government introducing retrospective legislation if they wish to.

It would be wrong of me to let the debate go by without saying that there should be full recognition of the grave effects that the Cakebread decision has had on county councils such as those in the area that I represent. Staffordshire county council was involved in lengthy legal proceedings when the Cakebread case was heard. The matter has been taken up by the council with hon. Members on both sides of the House representing the area, and the council has subsequently taken the matter up with the local authority associations.

I should like the Minister to accept that this is an anomaly with which the Government can and will deal, so that my county council will not have to make grave cuts because of a shortfall in expenditure caused by no fault of its own but by the fact that it has had to give huge amounts of money to the water authorities at a time when we all know that privatisation is just around the corner.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mrs. Virginia Bottomley): The hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) put the facts clearly. Let me go over some of the ground. One of the key figures in determining how much grant each authority receives is its rateable value. The higher the rateable value, the less grant it needs. The 1980 legislation on rate support grant provides that the rateable value of each area is taken from the valuation list on the specified date. That date has always been 1 April, 12 months before the year in question. The gross figure taken from the valuation list is then adjusted to allow for the relief given to charities and to unoccupied buildings.

When a ratepayer challenges a rateable value, it often takes some time for the ratepayer's proposal to be determined. With complex legal cases, it can take several years. Rating law provides that the ratepayer enjoys the benefit of any reduction in rateable value going back to the date on which the proposal was made or, in some cases, 1 April of the rating year during which the proposal was made. This reduction in rateable value does not, however, have a retrospective effect for rate support grant purposes.

The amendment is designed to require the Secretary of State to take into account changes to the valuation list when calculating grant entitlement. The aim is that where a local authority faces a loss of rate income, for example because of a valuation decision, the authority should receive extra block grant in compensation.

Hon. Members on both sides of the Committee have described consequences for local authorities of the decisions in the Cakebread and Addis cases. In the former, as the hon. Member for Normanton said, the Court of Appeal found that certain premises used by all water authorities should not be separately rated as had always been thought to be the practice, but they were included within the formula rating arrangements applicable to the water industry. In the Addis case, the House of Lords found that the creation of an enterprise zone was a factor justifying a reduction in rateable value. That went against the conventional understanding that changes in economic circumstances were not grounds for changes in rateable value between normal revaluations.

In both cases, the Government took the view that the law, as declared by the courts, should not be allowed to stand and that the position should be restored to the one that had always been assumed to operate prior to the decisions. The Government therefore included the necessary clauses in the Local Government Finance Act 1988 to restore the position. The new basis applies to all proposals for revaluations made after 9 March—the date on which the Secretary of State announced the change.

We recognise that local authorities have had to make refunds in respect of the period up to the Secretary of State's announcement. As the hon. Member for Normanton said, about £95 million of rates will have to be refunded. Clearly, it is not possible to identify the amounts refunded as a result of the Addis case, although the hon. Gentleman made an estimate. Section 67 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 makes provisions that, deal with changes in rateable values. It provides that once a conclusive calculation has been made for any year, an authority may serve a notice on the Secretary of State if the rateable value is reduced and the reduction exceeds a threshold. The Secretary of State must then pay extra grant to the authority.

The threshold is presently set at 2·5 per cent., so existing provisions mirror roughly the position sought by the amendment, except that the amendment does not provide for a threshold. The amendment seeks to provide that any reduction in rateable value would result in extra grant. It does not mention increases in rateable value, which could also occur. Local authority associations have made representations to the Government, asking that they should provide compensation for authorities that have had to make refunds as a result of the two cases.

We considered those representations carefully, but we concluded that there was no case for departing from the existing arrangements—which I have just described—which were introduced precisely to deal with such circumstances. It would not be sensible or reasonable for the block grant system to track every change in rateable value that may have an effect on an authority's circumstances. It is sensible to take the valuation list at the most convenient point before each grant year begins and to fix on that as the basis for the calculations.

Section 67 of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 provides a mechanism for dealing with cases in which subsequent changes in rateable value are excessive. The threshhold was set at 2·5 per cent. by statutory instrument and the Opposition did not pray against it. The provisions are available to local authorities if the case under consideration fits the conditions set out. We see no overwhelming case for changing the provisions at present.

8.15 pm

My hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central (Mr. Lord) referred to Suffolk county council. I realise that Suffolk county council will be disappointed that, in the Cakebread case, the Court of Appeal found for the ratepayer rather than the district valuer and that, as a result, a refund of rates has had to be made. For reasons given by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government, that coincided for Suffolk with the date of 7 July. However, the cumulative loss for Suffolk for all the years affected amounts to less than 1·5 per cent. of the rate income for one year.

[Mrs. Virginia Bottomley]

I do not have the precise figure, but I can confirm that it is less than 1·5 per cent. However, I can offer my hon. Friend some comfort. The full supplementary reports are due to be made shortly and are about to go out for consultation. They are likely to result in an additional £1·1 million of grant to Suffolk.

Some hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, Central, have argued that retrospective legislation to reverse the court's decision should have been introduced, so that no repayments would have been due. We cannot accept that argument. It would be wholly unreasonable for the Government to introduce legislation that imposed a retrospective tax liability which, in the Addis case, would fall on private organisations. The Bill is not retrospective—it freezes expenditure information on the date on which the new policy was announced. That is quite different. The rating provisions in the Local Government Finance Act 1988 and the Bill are strongly similar, in that they operate from the date on which the new policies were announced. I therefore urge hon. Members to oppose the amendment.

Mr. Rooker: Will the Minister tell us how many times the 2·5 per cent. limit has been breached since it was agreed by the House? She has been well briefed, as she knows that the Opposition did not pray against it.

Mrs. Bottomley: I am not in a position to give that information.

Mr. Rooker: It is no good the Minister coming to the House to imply that Opposition parties agreed with the figure of 2·5 per cent., when she has not the information to back up her assertion. We are discussing a substantial sum of money—over £90 million—which will be used to featherbed the water authorities. If the Minister's argument about the 2·5 per cent. limit is valid, will she tell us how many times the limit has been breached, and therefore how many times the Government have had to recompense local authorities?

Mrs. Bottomley: I understand that the provision has been made use of once in Wales and never in England. The hon. Gentleman misses the point. Parliament has already discussed the matter and the 2·5 per cent. threshold was agreed.

Mr. Rooker: We are talking about very different circumstances. I challenge the Minister to give chapter and verse about whether a case similar to the Cakebread case was given as an example by Ministers. It is a case that has overturned the normal rating conventions.

It is ironic that the Minister should talk about Parliament's agreement. The Government guillotined the poll tax Bill, so Parliament did not have a chance to debate this matter then. The date of 10 March was legislated for in the summer. I admit that the announcement was made at the Dispatch Box on 10 March, but by that time the poll tax Bill had completed its Committee stage. The matter was never properly debated in the House. The first opportunity to have a debate on it has come tonight.

Mr. O'Brien: The Minister referred to the normal reduction in rateable values through the demolition of properties or the closure of factories. However, the case that we are presenting is different. The 2·5 per cent. threshold to which the Minister referred applies to the principle of the general reduction in rates because of changes in the local authority area. The reduction in rates usually comes about because older properties are removed from the valuation list or because certain industries close. We accept that if there is a substantial reduction, an application can be made for compensation under the rate support grant order.

We are not discussing demolished properties being removed from the valuation list. We are discussing properties that are taken out of the valuation list to the benefit of some ratepayers. In this case, the Severn-Trent water authority was one of the greater beneficiaries, but other water authorities throughout the country have also benefited. There is a substantial difference between the principle outlined by the Minister and the case that we are presenting, and I hope that she will accept that. It is abysmal that she should come here, miss the whole point of the argument and bring in other issues that have no bearing on the amendment. The amendment seeks to be fair to the authorities that have suffered because of the two decisions. I hope that the Minister will accept the amendment. If she does not, I hope that other hon. Members will support it.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. John M. Taylor and
Mr. Michael Fallon.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I beg to move amendment No. 16, in page 1, line 20, at end, insert—

'(d) assessing the needs of Metropolitan Districts in the light of increasing school rolls, number of temporary classrooms in use, unemployment levels, social security recipients, age of public building and housing stock, condition of roads, railway facilities and any other relevant factors to enable him to increase the payments of domestic rate relief grant and block grant.'.

I should like to make a few brief remarks about each item in the amendment to explain why I believe that the Committee should support the amendment. As Bradford is a metropolitan district council, I propose to concentrate on that city, although my remarks apply to all metropolitan district councils.

Many of the areas about which we are concerned, such as Bradford, are older industrial cities. Bradford has a number of specific problems, one of which is increasing school rolls. It is virtually unique among the major cities of our country in that its secondary school rolls are expanding. That fact should be taken into account when considering rate support or block grant.

About 500 temporary classrooms are in use in the Bradford metropolitan district and part of the allocation for the replacement of those classrooms by permanent extensions to our schools is being used to repair the temporary classrooms which need major repairs because they have been empty for so long. That is patently absurd and, contrary to what the Tories keep telling us, is not value for money. The Minister should take into account the fact that such cities as Bradford face that great problem.

A third of our schools were built before 1903. A large proportion of those older schools are often very well designed. I am not suggesting that they should all be bulldozed immediately to be replaced by modern buildings, but there is a special problem in maintaining and modernising some of Bradford's school buildings.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): I am glad that the hon. Gentleman implied that there was not necessarily any disadvantage in the design of those older schools. Is he aware that, in my constituency, there are several super schools over 300 years old which will last a great deal longer than much of the rubbish put up in the 1940s, 1950s and 1960s?

Mr. Cryer: I am sure that the hon. Lady has many happy memories of some of those schools being opened and that she will be willing to make out her own case when her turn comes.

One of Bradford's problems is that we now have a Conservative majority which is getting in on the mayor's casting vote. Most people consider that to be a form of cheating.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Rubbish.

Mr. Cryer: The Conservative majority in Bradford recently made a number of decisions that will make the position much worse. In the previous debate, it was suggested that the Tories were saving a little money by dismissing an employee to promote peace. The Tories propose to save £1·5 million a year by raising the price of school meals to 80p a day; £250,000 a year by cutting the number of caretakers and cleaning staff, which will make the building problem worse; £100,000 by scrapping the community education budget; and £125,000 by trimming furniture repairs and replacements. They propose to replace absent teachers with temporary staff only after at least three days' absence and to abolish a fund to help hard-pressed inner-city schools, in direct contravention of the Prime Minister's stated aims. In addition, they propose to save £228,000 a year by dismissing 13 advisory teachers and 43 jobs will remain vacant to save wages and equipment funds. Further measures include withdrawing support for creches at Shipley and Keighley colleges.

Those are major attacks on education in Bradford and it behoves the Minister to accept my amendment so that he can make some compensation for those vicious attacks put through on the mayor's casting vote in what the majority of Bradford citizens see as a straightforward means of cheating.

One of the other problems affecting Bradford is the level of unemployment. Over 22,000 people in Bradford metropolitan district are unemployed at present and there are 1,700 vacancies. The Tory-controlled council is proposing to cut the equivalent of 9,000 jobs at a time when there is a deficit of over 20,000 jobs. It is proposing to throw the equivalent of 9,000 people in full and part-time jobs on to the dole. That is outrageous and that is why I included the issue of unemployment in the amendment.

The level of unemployment in Bradford is well above the national average. When unemployment pay runs out, people receive social security benefits. The number of people in Bradford receiving benefits will therefore increase and the Minister should also take that factor into account.

The Tories in Bradford also propose callously, coldly and viciously to sell off 15 old people's homes. Elderly people who have spent their lives working for the community are to be sold off like so many chattels or items on an accountant's balance sheet. At the council meeting on 25 October, a Tory councillor said:

"If you do not grasp the nettle of these crumbling homes for the elderly, then I think it's shameful."

I invite the Minister to grasp that nettle by enabling the condition of public buildings, including old people's homes, to be taken into account in assessing the grant requirements of cities such as Bradford.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is my hon. Friend aware that a few days after that decision was taken on the casting vote of the mayor there was a remarkable spin-off in a Nottingham by-election? When the story of the Tory decision in Bradford was told, the result was to turn a Tory majority of 400 into a Labour majority of 600. We must continue to put that message across, as my hon. Friend and others are doing in the Chamber, so as to alert the electorate in every town and city. Does my hon. Friend agree that Nottingham was a very good start?

Mr. Cryer: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing attention to that. Here is an opportunity for the Government to state that there are criteria other than the whims of a tiny, extreme Right-wing clique on Bradford council. I am sure that the Government have noted the election result in Nottingham. There is no doubt in my mind or, I am sure, in the minds of my hon. Friends that if the Tories had revealed their dstardly plans to sell off old people's homes and sack 9,000 people we would have held Odsal with a vast majority.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is out of date because on Thursday the Conservatives won a seat on Hyndburn district council, bringing us very near to getting control.

Mr. Cryer: The amendment concerns metropolitan districts, of which Hyndburn is not one, so the parallel cited by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is far more accurate than any other example given so far.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Is my hon. Friend aware that within two or three days of the change of control in Bradford the Tories in Halifax were bragging that if they had taken control in May they would have been prepared to close old people's homes? Does my hon. Friend agree that this may be part of a Tory plan for wholesale privatisation of old people's homes wherever they gain control?

Mr. Cryer: It is clearly implicit in the Bradford policy. Many Tories, including members of the Government, are saying that that is the kind of policy that local authorities should adopt, with callous disregard of old people's wishes.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay) rose——

Mr. Cryer: I will give way to the hon. Member for ticket touts in a moment.

A survey which I understand was commissioned by the local authority from Market and Opinion Research International showed that elderly people did not wish to be sold off. The so far unpublished poll of 138 elderly people showed that more were worried about being sold off than took the matter calmly and that there were high levels of satisfaction with all aspects of the local authority homes. The Minister may argue that old people's homes can be sold off and thus need not be taken into account for grant, but that survey invalidates that view. I know that the Minister supports balloting, as he voted for legislation requiring trade unions to engage in balloting until it comes out of their ears—although not, of course, at GCHQ, as today's splendid demonstrations showed. That survey by MORI, unpublished but handed to the local authority, shows clearly that old people do not want to be sold off.

Mrs. Gorman: It is always stimulating to be given a rub-down by the thinking woman's version of a Brillo pad. The hon. Gentleman may be interested to know that I have had a word with the leader of the Conservatives on Bradford council on the subject of the old people's homes. It seems that under the long-term Labour administration the homes had become very rundown. The people now running Bradford are quite sensibly bringing in the private sector to do a better job for the old people with, one hopes, better conditions and better value for money. There is no question of the homes being closed down, so the hon. Gentleman is misleading the Committee.

Mr. Cryer: I intend to press my amendment on the basis that the Minister should take into account the condition of public buildings such as those old people's homes. The hon. Lady could not have raised the matter at a more opportune time, as I have here a secret internal memorandum from Bradford recommending:

> "It should also be a condition of the sale that specific essential repairs be carried out in appropriate cases in addition to the alterations that will be necessary for each home to provide the acceptable ratio of single occupancy bedrooms required for private registration."

That is a recommendation to the director of social services that money should be spent on the homes before they are put up for sale.

Mr. Patnick: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Cryer: I should like to finish this point.

Moreover, there is a suggestion that the homes could be put up for sale illegally because it is proposed that there should be a restrictive covenant to ensure that they are run in a particular way. The recommendation states:

> "You will note from the reports that in most cases that the proposal to sell the properties with the restriction on future use the expected purchase prices are less than an expected purchase price on an unrestricted sale, substantially less in some instances. It is therefore clear that the proposed disposals whether sold individually or as one sale could well be in breach of Section 123 of the Local Government Act 1972. This Act provides that an Authority must not, without the consent of the Secretary of State, dispose of land for a consideration less than the best that can reasonably be obtained."

It suggests that the local authority is trying to sell off the homes at a cut price and thus to evade the provisions of the 1972 Act, and it rather suggests that the enterprise culture is indeed the corrupt culture that many of us believe it to be.

The other cruel section of the memorandum—it is merely advice given to the local authority, but it is restricted because it is not the kind of thing that the Tories would want to become public—suggests:

> "It may be worth considering as an alternative that two or three of the homes only be sold as 'going concerns' to test the market."

The proposal is that old people should be made to suffer in the evening of their lives so as to test the market to see where the wretched Tories can raise some more money.

I do not believe that the Minister shares that cold, calculating view. I hope, therefore, that in his reply today he will express some sympathy for the view that money should be available to take into account the age of public buildings so that money can be spent to satisfy those old people who were virtually balloted through MORI, their wish to stay in those homes can be met and money can be made available from central Government for repairs and rehabilitation.

Another of the criteria is the housing stock, which in Bradford is mostly intended for the elderly. Few new houses have been built, because of Government restrictions. Phase three of a development on a major estate in my constituency has been frozen. There are problems with the so-called Boot houses, which are prefabricated homes built in the 1930s that have developed faults and are expensive to repair——

Mr. Skinner: Were they built by private enterprise?

Mr. Cryer: Yes, they were built by Henry Boot. The local authority is picking up the bill for houses that, in later years, have proved to be faulty. The Minister should take that into account. The faults of private enterprise are being visited upon the tenants or, in some cases, the purchasers and the tab is being picked up by the local authority.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) is not present this evening——

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) is probably trying to sort himself out. When we recently voted on a Lords amendment relating to dental and eye check charges, he voted with the Opposition the first time but, strangely, did not do so on the second occasion.

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. Nicholas Winterton): Order. Interventions must be relevant.

Mr. Cryer: I take my hon. Friend's point. The hon. Member for Keighley is the only one of the five Members concerned who is not here this evening. All the Labour Members are present.

In the rush towards privatisation we should remember that in 1971 the Keighley Tories privatised the council's housing maintenance department and handed it to two private contractors. That maintenance was so bad, and so little was done because the money had gone into the pockets of those contractors, that under local government reorganisation in 1974 the Bradford Tories had to establish a new direct works department. They had to spend more money in Keighley than in any other area in Bradford metropolitan district to remedy the damage done. That must be taken into account when assessing grant for Keighley.

Another of the criteria listed in the amendment relates to roads, although I do not wish to comment in detail on that. The Telegraph and Argus last year ran a campaign about the poor condition of roads. An area called Queensberry, which has produced the famous Black Dyke Mills band—the glamorous side of Queensberry—has had its expenditure on private street works frozen. Roads in some parts are like medieval quagmires. In today's society it is wrong that there are no decent roads to service decent, sturdy, terraced houses. The Government should provide grant for the carrying out of those street works.

Railway facilities are also mentioned in the amendment. At Low More in my constituency the proposed station is low on the list of priorities. The Minister should take that into account because such a station would be a boon to my constituents who have to suffer a poor bus service—which has become very much worse since the legislation introduced by the then Secretary of State for Transport, now the Secretary of State for the Environment. I note that the right hon. Gentleman is sitting shyly in a corner of the Chamber. His transport legislation was bad, as is his environment legislation. Both are so terrible that it is difficult to judge between the two. It would help Bradford if the Minister bore in mind the fact that there are two separate stations and that it would be useful to link the two. If that was done Bradford would be placed on the railway map.

The Tory council in Bradford was elected on the strength of a by-election when people were not given the relevant information. They were deceived. The Tories lied about their plans and denied that they would embark on any cuts. The Tory candidate's election address did not mention that 9,000 people would be made redundant and that there would be cuts in community centres and so on. That council is embarking on savage cuts that will have the greatest impact on the poorest people in Bradford.

In voting for the amendment, hon. Members will vote for an opportunity for central Government finance to overcome the Tories' savage cuts. I invite the hon. Members for Shipley (Sir M. Fox) and for Keighley to vote for the amendment, which would help to rescue some of the buildings and facilities in their constituencies. If the amendment is not carried, the cuts will cripple many families, both directly and indirectly through the provision of such services as education. Any Tories who vote against the amendment will be callously voting to kick the ordinary, hard-working, decent people of Bradford in the teeth.

Mr. Patnick: The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) promised to allow me to intervene in his speech, but I now realise that he suffers from galloping amnesia. As my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) reminded us, the hon. Gentleman's description of his metropolitan district is typical of any metropolitan district today. I could make similar arguments for Sheffield: indeed, I did so on Second Reading.

I was taken to task by members of Sheffield council for suggesting that Sheffield could make further savings. Sheffield actually runs the Karl Marx memorial lecture, which was introduced by the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) at the Sheffield memorial hall on Friday 11 March 1988. The lecture was organised by Sheffield city council's central policy unit, and supported by Sheffield city council's police and community safety panel. The subject was "the state, the police and the inner city". It was the sixth Karl Marx memorial lecture.

In February 1985, the then leader of Sheffield city council, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett), in an article in the well-known magazine "Sheffield Today", made the following germane point:

"The hardest hit councils, not just the rate capped ones, are asking for the same three things from Central Government:

1. getting rid of the unfair system of financial targets and penalties which eats into council grants
2. restoring the grant to a fair level so that less money has to be found from the rates
3. giving up trying to use the Rates Acts to force councils into cutting jobs and services."

That is the very basis of the legislation before us.

Wages and salaries form at least 68 per cent. to 70 per cent. of the costs of running a council. I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer). If there are 9,000 redundancies to be made in Bradford, it would bankrupt the council. It would not have the cash to fund such redundancies. Nowhere at all can it find money for redundancy payments to 9,000 members of staff, be they full-time, part-time, or whatever. It cannot do it. It is one of the myths that the hon. Member for Bradford, South has repeated many times in the House. From all the hon. Members for Bradford we have heard the greatest crop of misinformation that has ever been placed before the House. We should tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. We should not hear about the way in which Opposition Members see the matter from their political stance. We should deal with it on a factual basis, and I did so. I went to see Eric Pickles, and I said to him, "With 9,000 staff and all these things you are doing, how, where and why?"

I shall give the proper story from Bradford. It is a load of rubbish that it is getting rid of many staff. One hundred and fifty staff are due to be redeployed, and that works out at a cost of £1·8 million. What did Bradford decide to do? It has freed managers to work without political interference. It removed the Left-wing trappings from standing orders. It protects the right of minority political groups and promotes open government. It has changed standing orders to reduce the size and number of committees. It has reduced committee places from 460 to 180. It has reorganised the priorities and duties of committees. It has abolished Left-wing talking shops and other things. It has introduced committees to oversee competitive tendering in all departments. It has brought in, as Sheffield had to bring in, cash-limit budgets. It has reorganised conduct and voting at council meetings in a more effective way. Savings of £6 million were needed to be approved on 25 October. Savings of £5·8 million this year and £8 million next year will prevent the council from re-rate-capping.

What about other councils? What about Wakefield? Nobody has mentioned the £20 million——

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Before the hon. Gentleman moves from Bradford to Wakefield, if Bradford council does not plan to dismiss 9,000 men and women over the next five years—2,500 full-time jobs—will he explain why the amendment, which he and several of his Conservative colleagues sponsor, refers precisely to 2,500 fewer jobs in Bradford?

Mr. Patnick: I am obliged to the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. All will be revealed as I make my speech in my way, not in the way in which he wishes it to be made.

Already, savings of £11 million have been made in Wakefield. Sheffield has £20 million to cut from its budget, and Brent has a £17 million decrease. Hon. Members have heard a lot about benefit shops. Three were closed because they duplicated the work of social services who employed staff and a mobile advice centre. The council is moving them into one-step shops, which will enable ratepayers to go into shops and receive information. There are no education cuts. Therefore, the cost of meals is going up to 80p. Had the cost of meals gone up by 5p a year between 1984 and 1988, they would now be at 80p—the very price they are to be. According to CIPFA, Bradford recovers 21 per cent. of meal costs through revenue, while the cost of meals in Calderdale, Kirklees, Leeds and Wakefield is 10 per cent. higher than in Bradford, and one third of all meals are free. Thirty-seven per cent. of schoolchildren do not pay for any increase. In Calderdale, Kirklees, Wakefield and Leeds, the average is 22 per cent.

Brent, when faced with that problem, sacked 230 teachers, reduced teachers' salaries by £2 million, sliced discretionary awards to students, and tried to abolish school meals and nursery education, but it was unsuccessful.

I have heard quite a lot from the hon. Member for Bradford, South about the lord mayor of Bradford. There were no elections to be held during the next year, so it was decided, as the Conservatives had the majority, to use the lord mayor's casting vote. As I have explained, that is a trick or ploy that Sheffield has used for many a year. Only Socialists can ever be lord mayor of Sheffield: that is the way the cookie crumbles. But when Conservatives do it, suddenly it is all wrong.

An injection of cash is needed to bring the old people's homes up to standard. The social services directorate admitted the shocking statistic that nine of the 13 homes would fail to be registered if they were in the private sector. The council must ensure the proper care of the district's elderly people, but it is abundantly clear that it has not the resources to provide suitable facilities of its own. A feasibility study showed that, if the homes were transferred to the private sector, the Department of Social Security would provide full income support for 68 per cent. of the residents and slightly reduced income support for 19 per cent. For only 13 per cent. would no income support be provided. If all the homes were transferred, the ratepayers of Bradford would save £2·3 million a year in revenue costs. Those would be capital savings.

Mrs. Mahon: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Hon. Members: Give way.

Mr. Patnick: Hon. Members must not start lecturing me about etiquette and giving way. When I asked the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) to give way, he promised that he would, but carried on making his speech.

Some £10 million in capital costs will be needed to bring the homes up to a proper standard. The £2·3 million savings would finance a new team of inspectors. The eight new staff appointed will register and inspect private homes throughout the district and ensure that they meet the high standards set by the council. It is clear that, if the homes are transferred, the care of the elderly will be improved. The social services directorate said that nine of the 13 buildings were virtually unfit for human habitation and would never be improved by the council.

Mrs. Gorman: Does my hon. Friend agree that the homes were in danger of deteriorating into the kind of condition that was allowed to prevail in the Nye Bevan home run by a Socialist London council? Their state was so disgraceful that they had to be closed down by outside intervention. Does my hon. Friend agree that if the council had remained under Labour control the same would have happened in Bradford?

Mr. Patnick: I thank my hon. Friend for her intervention. It is clear that if the homes are not transferred they will deteriorate. As it is, the council has additional resources to monitor carefully the quality of care offered by the private sector. The transfer would guarantee a proper level of capital investment, while day-to-day care is as good as, or better than, that offered in the public sector. In Sheffield, homes were closed because they were claimed to be "not suitable" for the care of the elderly.

Houses have not gone into disrepair since the Tory Government came in in 1979. Council after council has allowed its housing stock to deteriorate. We have a responsibility because it was decided to replace with tower and point blocks and high-density housing, nearly all of it concrete, the smaller terrace-type houses that could be converted and improved at reasonable cost.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South mentioned Reema building such houses, but Sheffield city council built houses that had mould growing on the inside, and they have all had to be knocked down. It cannot be claimed that just one contracting company built such houses. The decision to build houses on a mass scale was a curse of the society in which we lived at the time. The Bradford Tory group on the council decided to increase rents by £3 from late November and to reconsider the housing revenue account at Budget time. The Labour group rents for the three years from 1983 to 1985 were such that if the matter were not so serious it would be laughable.

The Temporary Chairman: Order. I am listening carefully to the debate and I have allowed frequent references to Bradford, but I hope that hon. Members participating in the debate will relate their remarks to the terms of amendment No. 16, not purely to Bradford. The amendment is much wider than just the metropolitan district of Bradford.

Mr. Patnick: I am obliged to you, Mr. Winterton, for putting me back on the right road. I am referring to the needs of metropolitan district councils and the deterioration in the housing stock. What applies to Bradford also applies to Sheffield and most of the housing stock throughout the country. It is a fact that some major refurbishment is taking place with the housing action areas and the estate projects, and that the deterioration in the housing stock did not start to happen in 1979.

All authorities have a bureaucratic nature. They have central services, personnel, architects, accounting, computing and a chief executive's office. All this work has been duplicated and duplicated, and the new committee structures need to be mirrored elsewhere.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South was allowed to make his speech virtually about Bradford alone, but I appreciate my position. Nevertheless, to return to Bradford, I disagree with Opposition Members that the situation in Bradford is so different from that, were there a change in control of another local authority. I do not accept that all the ills of local government started in 1979 with the election of a Conservative Government. I do not accept that all the houses, the schools and public buildings have deteriorated since 1979.

I accept that for a long time we have needed a change in local government funding. I accept that anyone who uses council services should contribute to them both through the tax system and through the rating system. I do not accept some Labour Members' argument that the community charge is a poll tax. That is the argument of people who wish not to vote, but they can decide if and when they pay their community charge whether to go into the polling booth. The law does not insist that one votes. In Sheffield only 24 per cent. of the electorate bothered to vote. It is a fact that if people pay a community charge, more people vote.

I cannot accept the amendment or the hon. Gentleman's claim that his constituency is unique in that the Conservatives have taken control. Otherwise, Bradford would have been a rate-capped city. Sheffield was rate-capped and has not been since. It is up to the local authority to pull itself back into the 20th century and then to go forward as the Bradford Tories have done.

9.15 pm

Mr. Pat Wall (Bradford, North): In recent years cuts in rate support grant from about 60 per cent. to 40 per cent. have placed enormous strains on local authorities, and the amendment in the names of my hon. Friends the Members for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) and for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) deals with the relationship between rate support grant and the social problems of urban areas, especially the historic problems of neglect and aging over more than a century.

Government policy has meant that the more local authorities spend above GRE, the more they lose. Conversely, the greater the deficiency on GRE, the more grant aid they receive. Since 1979, we have had 20 Acts to reduce the powers of local authorities. That legislation has severely affected many local authorities. First, we had a system of targets. That system was unfair to many authorities. In the end, the Government recognised that and modified it so that local authorities were judged on their historical spending patterns. Most authorities received sums equal to the figures that they had already produced or a little above. Then we had the added complication of the so-called multiplier.

Bradford, Birmingham, Sunderland, Cleveland and an authority in Derbyshire suffered extreme losses although they have never been rate-capped or gone above GRE. The figure for Bradford for the past three years is £38 million, or a rate of 87p in the pound, and the average cost has been £110 per ratepayer. That sort of expenditure has not been repeated in many other authorities, even including Leeds —our immediate neighbour, and a city of similar size. That shows the high cost of Toryism to the ratepayers of Bradford.

About two years ago, the Government began to retreat and tried to recognise the social needs of cities and inner urban areas such as Bradford, but their wishes were overturned by the revolt of their friends in the Tory shire counties, who demanded that grants be made per head of population, not on the basis of social need. That ideal was enshrined in the Local Government Act 1988, which created the so-called community charge.

Bradford has serious problems, with one quarter of men and three fifths of women officially recognised as low-paid, one third of families on some form of state benefit and 60,000 people in receipt of the old supplementary benefit alone.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South said, one third of our schools were built before 1903. I understand that tomorrow Dixon's will announce that it has negotiated with Bradford city council to build a city technology college in the city. It will donate about £1 million from its charity fund, which will be matched by Government expenditure of between £4 million and £10 million. Education in Bradford will be cut by £3,370,000 this year and by about £3·5 million the following year. Bradford does not need £4 million to £10 million of Government expenditure on a college for a tiny section of the community. It needs an effort to restore the cuts that are proposed by the Conservative council and to make good the years of neglect in our inner city. Newcastle, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Glasgow and the older industrial cities have suffered similarly.

Mr. Cryer: Does my hon. Friend accept that the amount of money that will come from the public purse for this CTC in Bradford is the equivalent of all the money that will go on capital expenditure for the whole of the public sector in the Bradford metropolitan area? Is it not a scandal that that should be permitted under this Tory Government?

Mr. Wall: To bring the schools in Bradford up to a modern standard requires the expenditure of £10 million a year over the next 10 years, and our allocation for school building and renovation is only £6 million a year. Our position will not be different from that of other cities.

The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) mentioned housing starts. Again, our city is not unusual; its housing starts fell from 2,200 in 1978-79 to only 800 in 1986-87—a fall of 64 per cent. At the same time, the Government have forced local authorities to sell their best houses, but have restricted their ability to reinvest those proceeds in house building. That has led to a reduction of one third in the stock of council houses in that period—in a city with a housing waiting list of more than 8,000 people.

Bradford's backlog of repairs will cost some £130 million, which is more than 10 years of our total housing grant. However, the Conservative council intends to cut expenditure on housing and the environment by £43,000 this year, including, in a spiteful move, £7,500 which was originally intended for emergency accommodation for the homeless. I raised with the Prime Minister in the House the matter of a young man of 17 who was forced to live in a rubbish skip overnight.

It is not just council tenants who suffer. The number made homeless through mortgage default or rent arrears has trebled in Bradford during the past five years. Bradford, like other cities, has real social problems that the Government penalties have created and which have led to a crisis in many urban areas. The relevance for Bradford is that unlike most urban areas, we now have a Conservative majority and, if the reactionary proposals of the council are carried through, it will be on the basis of a wild west scenario of two-vote Smith Midgeley, who has more in common with the sheriff of a wild west town, such as Dodge City, than with the mayor of a hard-working west riding city.

If I may use the western analogy again, the hon. Member for Hallam bored us with an inordinate speech on Brent last Monday, despite the fact that he was a city councillor in the city of Sheffield. Having travelled from Sheffield to Brent, he has now moved this week to the city of Bradford, and he reminds me of the motto of the old western hero, "Have gun, will travel." In his case, it is "Have local government speech, will travel to any area" where his party may need assistance, because it has a lack of speakers on the subject.

The combination of social problems and the rate support grant has hit inner-city areas, and has hit, too, the Minister's friends in Bradford. I do not think that outsiders realise that there are not just three Labour seats in the city of Bradford; it is a metropolitan district which has five seats, including Keighley and Shipley.

Mr. Madden: Where are those hon. Members?

Mr. Wall: They are not here tonight.

I have done a rough calculation without checking the figures in the Library, but in the 1987 general election the Conservatives had a majority of 9,000 votes over the Labour party for the combined five seats and, because of the peculiarities of the way in which the boundaries were drawn and because the addition of Ilkley prevented Keighley from becoming a Labour seat, the metropolitan district is not a typical Labour heartland. However, up to two years ago the council was either Conservative-run or was a hung council that was basically a Conservative council with alliance support. Labour took the council in the first place because of the rate increase of more than 30 per cent. imposed by Bradford council. It was the cut in Government rate support grant and the special cuts of £38 million for Bradford that led to that rate increase and to the defeat of the Conservative council at that time, and the election of a Labour council in the metropolitan district for the first time.

The secret behind what is happening in Bradford, which has national implications, is that we are faced with a massive auction of public assets to reduce the burden of the poll tax in its first year of introduction. That is no basis for future planning for any local authority and it is no way in which to tackle the enormous social problems that my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South and I have outlined today and last Monday.

The Government have a chance to consider the plight of the five towns that lost last year under the terms of the multiplier, which affected the rate support payments. They have the chance to make good that loss during the current year. That does not just go for the £38 million already mentioned. The Minister should help his political friends in Bradford by giving the council the sum of between £4 million and £10 million that will otherwise go to the city's CTC, supposing that Dixon's plans go through. In that way, the cuts of £5 million announced by Bradford council would not have to be made and a burden would be lifted from some of the poorest working-class communities in Bradford. Those people are facing an increase of £1 per week per child for school meals. If a family has three children and has to pay an extra £3 per week, that represents a real cut for a textile worker on low wages and is an infringement of that person's standard of living.

I do not believe that the flint-hearted members of the Government, the Minister's Departmant or the Tories who now run Bradford council will take a humane and reasonable attitude to the special problems that Bradford has suffered over the years. However, I must warn them, even if Bradford metropolitan district is not a traditional Labour area. The Tories tried the same trick with London as they are trying with Bradford. When they were defeated in the old London county council, they redrew the boundaries and formed the Greater London council. They met with defeat there as well. As night follows day the result of the policies introduced in the city of Bradford will mean that, for the first time, there will be a massive Labour majority when we get the next opportunity at the polls. In common with the GLC, that city council will also go Labour, it will remain so and the only way in which the Government will demolish that will be if they abolish the council itself.

Mr. Madden: We are gathered together in the Committee to consider the Rate Support Grants Bill and I shall take as my text an unlikely source—an article written——

The Temporary Chairman: Order. The text that the hon. Gentleman should take for his speech is amendment No. 16.

Mr. Madden: I wholeheartedly support amendment No. 16, which refers to assessing the needs of metropolitan districts in the light of a number of matters. I intend to refer specifically to unemployment levels and social security recipients.

In an article in The House Magazine of 7 November, Councillor Eric Pickles, the leader of the Bradford Conservative group, said:

"Bradford may seem an unlikely place to host a Conservative revolution in local government . . . People are simply not used to decisive action in local government and the speed with which we are moving has taken them by surprise. It may have taken until 4·30 in the morning, but at the council meeting two weeks ago, we did more to reform Bradford Council in one night than the Labour Group had done in two years of control. The Conservative programme for Bradford council, the first phase of which"—

I stress "the first phase"—

"was passed at last month's meeting, has three related parts. Firstly, the management structure of processes within the organisation must change to meet the new environment created by Government legislation. Secondly, the structure and concerns of committees must reflect the priorities of an enabling Council, not a paternalistic bureaucracy. Finally, the extent and character of the services delivered by the Council must be made relevant to the real needs of the people of the district."

Councillor Pickles has great difficulty in identifying real people. In our local media, he has been widely quoted as referring to the people who were extremely concerned about the matters that were steamrollered through at the council meeting, and to which he referred, as not "real people", but members of the Labour party.

Councillor Pickles and the hard-line clique of associates with whom he is now seeking to introduce, by stealth, his hidden agenda, must tell us how the real needs of real people in Bradford are to be met. Who decides? Who sets the criteria? As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, North (Mr. Wall) said, for a new city technology college to be announced tomorrow in Bradford is surprising news indeed because I do not believe that such a college represents the most overwhelming need of real people in the city of Bradford at present. An enormous amount of public subsidy will be put into building a new college in my constituency, on land that was previously devoted to housing. We have enormous housing needs and, as my hon. Friends the Members for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) and for Bradford, North have said, we have an education crisis and are trying to improve the education service and the fabric of our established schools, so we need a city technology college like a hole in the head.

If the college comes about—I have grave doubts that it will—inevitably it will do great damage to upper schools in Bradford and to Bradford and Ilkley community college, the largest in Britain. It will cream off the ablest young pupils from upper schools and the ablest staff from existing institutions. It will do great damage to our education, which is already in considerable difficulty.

If there are large sums of money available from the private sector, I believe that it should be put into existing schools, many of which are facing great difficulties because of shortages of equipment and books and which lack other basic amenities. If the Government are willing to put into Bradford about £4 million or £6 million, the major priority must be improving our education service, and improving Bradford college, not building a shiny new college which, if it is built, will become known as Kenneth Baker's folly. I strongly urge the Government to have considerable second thoughts about the wisdom of proceeding with a city technology college in Bradford.

In Bradford there are many unemployed people and people on low incomes, who need to know where they can get help. They need information. I should like to confine my remarks to my concern and that of many others in Bradford about the decision of the new Bradford Tory council to close our benefit advice shops—unlike the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick), who seems to have been imported into the debate in the absence of his hon. Friends the Members for Shipley (Sir M. Fox) and for Keighley (Mr. Waller) to speak about Bradford, but who seems to know very little about it. I hope that he knows more about Sheffield. In recent debates he has given us a gazetteer of all sorts of different places in London and other parts of the country. He should have limited his remarks about Bradford, because they seemed to be singularly uninformed.

The people of Bradford need advice on the benefit help that is available. They need to be given the correct application forms and advice and assistance in completing those forms. If help is refused, they need assistance in making appeals to social security tribunals and other appeal bodies. Many Asian men and women who live in Bradford need particular help across the range of matters that I have mentioned. Bradford Tory council's decision to close the benefit advice shops seems to be at odds with the Government's declared objective to target help where it is most needed. That is crazy and, in my language, it is plain daft.

Thousands of people in Bradford have received advice from the benefit advice shops about the DHSS, about unemployment benefit offices, about housing benefit and much else. More than 60,000 people have received good, accurate, helpful advice from our benefit advice shops over the past three years. That is very relevant to amendment No. 16. I urge the Minister, who the other day did not seem to be aware of Bradford Tory council's plans to withhold funding from Bradford's citizens advice bureaux or to close the benefit advice shops, to investigate the matter urgently. I urge him also to have talks with his colleagues in the DHSS and at the Department of Employment because I believe that this matter is vital. Bradford Tory council should be prevented from closing the benefit advice shops.

The benefit advice shops are seen to give independent advice. That cannot be said of the DHSS, the UBOs or the jobcentres. If the Minister consults the staff of those bodies, they will tell him that the public perceive the DHSS, UBOs and jobcentres as part of the system. The public do not believe that they give independent or impartial advice. Those agencies will tell the Minister that the great value of our housing benefit advice centres is that they are seen to be independent. The difficulty in Bradford is that not only is the Tory council closing the benefit advice shops: it is also threatening to close many independent advice centres organised by voluntary groups in different parts of the local community.

Ministers are obsessed with everything being cost-effective and offering value for money. I hope that the Minister will consider the contribution that the benefit advice shops make towards helping many people in Bradford. Those shops are vital to the local economy. If people are helped to get benefit to which they are entitled, they spend their benefit on local goods and services. That is good value for money.

Regrettably, the social fund has had a devastating effect on people's opportunities to get benefit to which they are entitled. In effect, it has reduced considerably the amount of money spent in our local community on goods and services by poor people and those on low incomes. I hope that the Minister, unlike the hon. Member for Hallam, will recognise that Bradford benefit advice shops do not duplicate services found in the local DHSS offices, in the local UBOs or in jobcentres. The advice shops provide advice which is perceived by the public to be extremely helpful and, most importantly, independent. They are not seen to be part of the establishment or part of the system.

In the context of this amendment, I urge the Minister to ensure that Bradford Tory council is told that it is important for the unemployed, for those on social security and for those who want to get benefit to which they are entitled, that urgent steps are taken to keep the benefit advice shops open.

I recently tabled parliamentary questions to discover the number of bilingual Asian staff in our local DHSS, UBOs and jobcentres. There are five Asian-speaking staff in the three DHSS local offices. None of the claimant advisers in our local UBOs is an Asian bilingual speaker and no such speakers are available in our job centres, each of which has only limited access to Asian interpreters. I again urge the Minister to look at the help that Bradford's benefit advice shops and other independent advice centres give to Asian people seeking information about benefit entitlement and help and information on a range of other matters.

If the Government continue down the road of targeting help on those most in need, they clearly have a responsibility to enable people entitled to help to get it easily. Those people must be able to get proper, accurate and independent advice. That need can be clearly seen in terms of family credit. We are told that the national take-up is only 30 per cent., and I do not think that it is any higher than that in Bradford.

I have raised these matters with the Minister, I think, three times. I ask him to save our benefit advice shops because if they close many Bradford people will lose. Our economy will also lose, and so will the local council. The closure of those shops will result in more rent and rate arrears. If we have to pay the dreadful poll tax, there will be poll tax arrears. There will be more disconnections of gas and electricity and more debts accruing to the electricity and gas boards. On all those matters, independent benefit advice is important.

The Minister seems to be laughing. I hope that he will address his considerable intellect, which has been displayed so often in our debates, to the real problems of people in Bradford. If he does that fairly and objectively, he will conclude, as many people in Bradford concluded long ago, that these benefit advice shops and other independent advice centres should be retained and allowed to continue to give good independent advice to the many men and women in Bradford who seek to use them.

Mrs. Mahon: I should like to address two matters relating to the amendment. One is about elderly social security recipients in residential homes and the second is about deteriorating housing stock. I challenge the statement by the hon. Members for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) and for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) that it would be better for elderly people to be cared for in private homes. I can speak from some experience because I spent many years caring for elderly people. It is morally unjustifiable to move people around as if they were unit costs and not give them any choice because they are elderly.

I appeal not to the Minister's intellect but to his Christianity and ask him to think before he allows wholesale privatisation of care for elderly people. It has not been proved that it is more cost-effective to keep elderly people in private homes. Taxpayers pay billions of pounds so that some people can make profits from the care of the elderly. If local authorities were given the same handouts as the private sector, I am sure that local authority homes would not be in the state of disrepair that we have heard about in the debate.

I remind the Minister of a sad tale in Calderdale concerning the Government's foolish policy on the repair of housing stock. In 1982 my metropolitan borough suffered a gale that badly affected some houses on a hillside in Calderdale. We have many hills in Calderdale and these houses were not placed in the most suitable site. The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) who was then the Minister for Housing and Construction, refused to give us a grant to repair the houses. Some years later, we were exposed to the estate action programme introduced by the Government, and the private sector let us down. We had to pull down 344 houses and flats and that was a scandal when there were 5,000 people on a waiting list.

The Government have now given £364,000 to a private developer to build on this land. The local authority is getting only £112,000 for the land and the private developer is bragging about making £250,000 profit out of the deal, but the ratepayers of Calderdale will be paying between £80,000 and £90,000 in debt charges for 40 years. I challenge any hon. Member to tell me that that is good economic sense. I urge the Minister to take note of the amendment and get some sense into local government finances.

9.45 pm

Mrs. Gorman: I had not intended to make a speech, but I wish to correct this point, because we have heard an awful lot about elderly people and homes. Privately owned homes for the elderly, as the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) knows, are heavily regulated and often visited by inspectors from the public sector, so there is no question of these institutions becoming rundown unless the inspectors are not doing their job properly. It is much more likely that public sector homes become rundown, because the inspectors are often in cahoots with the people running the public sector homes, because they are in the same unions and are all working together for the same council. That is how the Nye Bevan scandal developed. Everyone was covering up for everyone else, and that happens regularly in the public sector.

Mr. Gummer: I shall look at the situation in Bradford as an example, as it is the only example that has been given. In Bradford, the grant entitlement in 1988-89, which is the one no doubt to which hon. Members would like me to apply special arrangements, will be £151·5 million, which is £14 million more than it was in 1987-88.

Mr. Cryer: Not enough.

Mr. Gummer: That is the kind of helpful remark that the hon. Gentleman has been making this evening.

I am obsessed with value for money, because it is value for the taxpayers' and ratepayers' money and the value goes to those who are least able to help themselves. I find the debate upsetting because the reason for the change that Bradford is seeking to bring about is that for some time Bradford has been run at the behest not of the clients of the local authority but of the unions that run certain services. I am not surprised, because the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) was for some time the assistant campaign manager for the National and Local Government Officers Association, that he made the kind of speech that he did. The Labour party is always defending what is done by the unions, which take more from the local authorities than they should do and leave less for those who need help and whom the local authority should be helping.

It is surprising that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) made all that fuss about the increase in price for school meals. I did not notice him shouting at the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) because the Calderdale local authority in her constituency was charging 70p when Bradford was charging 60p. Is Calderdale a disgusting authority? Did I hear a fight about that? A price of 80p is not out of the ordinary. It is not a high price to pay for school meals when a third of those who take them get them free. It seems much better to give the money directly to those who need it.

It was a pity to hear the reactionary views of the hon. Member for Bradford, West about the city technology college. I do not know what the decision about the CTC will be, but I know that the attempt is to give better education in Bradford and to get a good deal of money for it from the private sector. The hon. Gentleman should welcome that. I am ashamed that he has tried to turn that down for his own city.

The hon. Member for Bradford, West should be ashamed of making his disgraceful comments about the staff of the unemployment benefit offices who work hard to provide advice. His comments were an insult to those who work long hours in difficult circumstances in those offices.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South should recognise that we should support a local authority which has changed control and wishes to do things for those who are least able to help themselves. An example is what that council is doing with old people's homes. The so-called "secret document" which the hon. Gentleman produced was no doubt another example of the kind of theft of which we have seen so much—[Interruption.] Well, it was either untrue to say that it was secret or, if it was secret, how did it get into the hon. Gentleman's hands——

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Miss Boothroyd. The Minister, whose tongue frequently runs away with him, has implied that I stole the document. May I put it on the record that that document was sent to me by a constituent and that Members of Parliament have every right to receive documents from constituents so that they can expose scandals that are taking place under Tory control?

The Second Deputy Chairman: That is not a point of order. Our Standing Orders have not been breached.

Mr. Gummer: I regret the comment that it was in any sense a theft by the hon. Gentleman. The document obviously fell off a lorry.

The truth is that Bradford has sought to do something about its old people's homes. As the document showed, Bradford has tried to raise the standards of its old people's homes, which had fallen disgracefully under the previous Labour administration.

The hon. Gentleman should take a leaf from the book of the Bishop of Bradford who, having discussed the matter with the leader of the Conservative group, said, "We shall be watching what the Conservative group does. We shall be monitoring it most carefully. I have now been satisfied on a number of things about which I was worried." I believe that under its new control, Bradford city council will try to improve things for the people of Bradford. I shall be watching and monitoring it most carefully. However, at least I shall do so honourably ad with an open mind instead of with the closed, reactionary Left-wing minds from which we have heard today.

What has been said has little to do with the Bill. However, it has shown that Opposition Members are still smarting from having lost that by-election.

Mr. Rooker: The Minister's comments are not an answer to the debate. The right hon. Gentleman has made absolutely no attempt to answer any of the debate on amendment No. 16. That is disgraceful. My hon. Friends, the Members for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer), for Bradford, North (Mr. Wall) and for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) make no apology for devoting the debate to the Bradford issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon). Has made points about her own local authority, as did the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick). However, the Minister completely ignored the issue.

Let us stick with Bradford a moment. The Minister may say that everything is okay, fine and rosy, but like other hon. Members, I have in my possession not a stolen document, but a disreputable document. It is the Conservative manifesto from last May. There is not a single mention in it of any of the things that are now being introduced by Bradford's Tory-controlled authority.

The Minister referred to attacks on staff in unemployment benefit offices and at the Department of Social Security. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South made no such attack. Indeed, the Minister must know that it is not part of the function of a civil servant in an unemployment benefit office or a social security office to give advice. Such civil servants are specifically debarred from giving advice. That is why, in all the social security pamphlets published by the Government, people are advised to go to citizens advice bureaux. Civil servants are not empowered to give advice. Therefore, my hon. Friend's point is valid because advice shops were and are required.

Advice bureaux are one of the areas of activity covered in the document which was compiled by the controlling group in Bradford. Among the political objectives set down by it for discussion on Tuesday 27 September was "abolition of current local authority functions not politically acceptable".
Giving advice to poor people so that they can maximise their benefits to assist the local economy is politically acceptable to the Opposition, but Conservative Members want no part in it.

The Minister talked about value for money. That is an important matter, to which we shall no doubt return. I suspect that, during the current year and probably the following year, Bradford will figure largely in that context. It will certainly figure next May, like the other large cities and metropolitan districts to which the amendment applies, because that is when the 36 metropolitan districts should have elections. We demand those elections. It does not matter whether they are in Birmingham or Bradford: we want those elections. The Government have banned the election in those 36 large towns and cities next May. They could easily have restored the annual elections in those cities when they abolished the metropolitan counties. Bradford can get away with what it is doing now because it does not have to face the electorate for two years.

The Labour party is not afraid to face the electorate. [Interruption.] We will stand by the results of the ballot box. The Government are scared stiff of bringing back annual elections in the large cities. They talk about democracy and accountability, but that is sheer cant and hypocrisy. We want those elections in the metropolitan districts next May.

One of the proposals put forward by Bradford, which I have not yet heard explained—perhaps one of my hon. Friends can explain it—relates to the top management contracts that will be introduced. Four factors were listed in the document. The top management will be placed on seven-year contracts. Salaries will be cut to 80 per cent., but it is clear that most top managers will be able to earn at least their existing salary, and it is intended that they will have the opportunity to earn 115 per cent. of their existing salary. Performance targets will be set and reviewed every two years. There is nothing wrong with that; that is good management practice, whether in the public or private sector.

However, I want an explanation of the words "perks to be introduced". I want to know what perks will be given to top management. Clearly, those would be supported by Government. They will be paying rate support grant in order to pay the perks to top managers who will be able to earn 115 per cent. of their salary. What perks will the Government be funding through the rate support grant? I want the answer to that question.

Mrs. Mahon: May I remind the Minister that Calderdale was controlled by Tories and Liberals continuously until May of this year?

Question put, That the amendment be made:

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. David Maclean and

Question accordingly negatived.

It being Ten o'clock, THE SECOND DEPUTY CHAIRMAN left the Chair to report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Rate Support Grants Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Neubert.]

Again considered in Committee.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Miss Boothroyd. A serious constitutional matter arose in the previous debate. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) appeared to take over the job of the Members of Parliament for Sheffield and Keighley, in that the Bradford amendment was proposed, but there was no representation of the Tory view from other hon. Members in the metropolitan district. I want to be assured that hon. Members are not having their jobs taken from them by the hon. Member for Hallam.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means: The Chair cannot give any assurance on that point. It has no relationship whatsoever to the Chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Schedule 1 agreed to.

Clause 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

TOTAL EXPENDITURE: 1989-90

10.15 pm

Mr. O'Brien: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 14, line 31, leave out from 'which' to end of line 34 and insert

'reflects the retail prices index for September 1988'.

The amendment refers to a formula in schedule 2, and in particular to the part of that formula described as 'Z'. It seeks to increase local authorities' budgets for 1988-89 in line with the latest estimate of inflation. If we are to be fair and give serious consideration to local authority expenditure, we must at least allow an increase for the rate of inflation. In this instance, we refer to the amount relevant to the calculation of grant entitlement in 1989-90.

Schedule 2 sets out the formula for determining a notional expenditure figure, "the relevant amount", for 1989-90, on which local authorities' grant entitlement will be based. 'TE' in the formula represents local authorities' 1988-89 budgeted expenditure, while 'Z' represents an inflation factor. The amendment puts on the face of the Bill an inflation factor in line with the index for September 1988. According to Government figures, the inflation factor for that month was recorded as 5·9 per cent.

Announcing the provision for local authority current expenditure in 1989-90 on 7 July this year, the Secretary of State said that the increase was slightly above the anticipated level of inflation. The increase, adjusted for the extra provision for poll tax costs, was 4·3 per cent., compared with the Government's latest forecasts for the increase in the gross domestic product deflator of 4 per cent. In July the retail price index was increasing faster, at a rate of 4·5 per cent. In the autumn statement, the Chancellor of the Exchequer raised the increase in the GDP deflator in 1989-90 to 5 per cent. Retail price inflation is forecast to rise in 1989-90 above the Chancellor's latest forecast of 6·25 per cent. in the fourth quarter of 1988 before falling back to 5 per cent. in the fourth quarter of 1989.

On either measure of inflation for 1989-90, the GDP deflator or the RPI, the provision for local authority expenditure in 1989-90 is insufficient to maintain current service levels. We are talking about inflation as it has been recorded by the Government, but for many reasons the inflationary factor facing local authorities is much larger than the recorded RPI factor. All we are asking is that the formula should meet the recorded increase of 5·9 per cent.

The Secretary of State should recognise the surge in inflation that has occurred since July and increase the expenditure provisions. A rise in the expenditure provision would necessitate an increase in Government grant, because otherwise ratepayers would bear the whole cost of the increased provision. That is the background to the amendment. I hope that the Minister will give some explanation of why the amendment cannot be accepted. It is a constructive approach to resolving the issues facing local government.

It would be much easier for the Minister to accept the amendment, ensuring that local authorities have the opportunity to meet their commitment in line with the increase in the RPI. I ask the Minister to accept the amendment. If she cannot, I ask her to give a viable or reasoned explanation of why it cannot be accepted.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The effect of the amendment on local government would be one which most Labour Members would greatly regret. I realise that the complexity of these matters is such that people do not always think through the effects. The higher the Z factor, the sharper the slope and the greater the effect on the higher spending authorities. Brent, about which we have heard a certain amount this evening, would stand to lose nearly £3 million if we accepted the amendment. Lambeth would lose £4 million, Islington £5·5 million, and Birmingham about £4 million.

I should like to explain briefly the Z factor, although I am not sure that it is the most edifying part of our discussions. It is important to be clear that the Z factor does not refer to the amount of grant available. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it clear in July that this is set to rise by 9 per cent., which is considerably above the level of inflation, to £13,575 million. The point about expenditure and the Z factor is rather different.

The amendment is about the factor in the forthcoming rate support grant settlement that is consistent with the proposal that local authority current expenditure should increase by 4·8 per cent. between this year and next. This factor, called the Z factor, is the uplift for total expenditure. In addition to current expenditure, total expenditure includes the financing costs of capital expenditure, but it excludes any expenditure financed by specific grants. Mainly due to the substantial increase in specific grants next year, such as the new grant for community charge preparation costs, the Z factor is likely to be about 1·032, which is a 3·2 per cent. increase. It will be spelt out more precisely in the consultation paper on next year's settlement.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) referred to our proposals for current expenditure provision generally and he urged us to say that local authority expenditure should rise by the retail price index for September, which is 5·9 per cent. That would be wholly inappropriate because while the RPI may be an appropriate measure for consumer prices, the generally accepted measure of inflation in the economy is the GDP deflator. It is forecast to rise by 5 per cent. in 1989-90 and our proposals on current expenditure provision are broadly in line with that.

The Z factor is not about the amount of grant to be available. That increases by 9 per cent., as my right hon. Friend announced. The amendment would have a particularly harsh effect on many local authorities that Labour Members most wish to help.

Mr. Cryer: Does the Z factor cover items such as increased capital expenditure on education? In the current year, Bradford will spend about £10·487 million on capital expenditure for school buildings. I have a press release from Dixon Group plc announcing that it will help to fund a city technology college in Bradford. The capital expenditure on that college will cost the public purse about £10 million. One small sector of education in Bradford will attract the equivalent of the capital expenditure on all the 258 public sector schools in Bradford. I wonder whether the increase in grant to £13 billion covers the announcement that will be made tomorrow?

The Government say that they make grant calculations, yet private bodies are making announcements about Government policy. They are handing over government to squalid little people such as Stanley Kalms who is making a bid for a knighthood by announcing this CTC. It is time that the Government made the position clear. Does local authority expenditure include these private ventures encouraged by the Secretary of State for Education and Science? It is an outrage that Dixon should make an announcement of £10 million of public expenditure, and I wish to know whether it has been included in the Minister's calculations or whether it is extra money that they can find for Dixon, but not for education in Bradford.

It is outrageous that the Government are lining the pockets of the private sector yet they cannot give the House a clear statement of whether such decisions are included in their calculations. Nor do we know whether they plan to take them into account in future calculations for rate support grant but cannot yet tell the House because a deal has not been reached with some get-rich-quick person—they are called entrepreneurs nowadays—who is trying to get a reward or a title.

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to the Minister for making part of the formula clear, although we still have many questions about the other factors of the formula in schedule 2.

The Minister said that if the retail price index was the factor of inflation it could have far-reaching effects on local authorities, but I am not convinced that that will be the case. Another worrying factor is the intention of water authorities, especially Yorkshire water authority, substantially to increase water charges. In Yorkshire and Humberside, local authorities will have to pay up to 27 per cent. more. I hope that the Minister will take note of that inflation in the coming year.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): Is my hon. Friend aware that the Yorkshire water authority is increasing charges to boat owners? Does not the Minister believe that it should try to keep prices down for leisure activities to enable the public to enjoy the recreational facilities that are so desperately needed in our area?

10.30 pm

Mr. O'Brien: It is clear that my hon. Friend is mirroring my worry which has been caused by the proposals of, especially, the Yorkshire water authority—proposals which I am sure will be followed by other water authorities —to make sure that privatisation is attractive. Those are the issues that will be facing local authorities and the Minister should be aware of that worry.

In presenting this amendment, I wanted to probe the question of the Z factor in the formula. Some explanation has been given, but I am sure that there are further questions that should be asked. Because of the complexity of this formula and the fact that we shall be referring to it again in the near future, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I do not intend to say very much more about the Z factor, but I would like to say that the mean attack by the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) on better education is irrelevant. To attempt to do Bradford out of a city technology college says very little for him and has nothing to do with the Z factor.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Would the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien) make his position clear on the amendment?

Mr. O'Brien: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Rooker: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 15, line 2, leave out from 'is' to end of line 5 and insert "such an amount as agreed after consultation with the Local Authority Associations, which amount represents the expenditure relevant authorities might reasonably be expected to incur in the year beginning in 1989 in connection with Part I of the Local Government Finance Act 1988.".

I invite hon. Members who are here to legislate to study page 15 of the Bill. There is a rather strange figure on the second line of page 15. It says:

"The Secretary of State shall secure that the aggregate of figures determined under this paragraph for relevant authorities is £53,057,231".

That is a very precise figure. It is incredibly accurate to the last pound. I know that we take the accuracy of poll tax calculations to extremes, but I believe that this one beats the lot.

I understand that 43 full-time civil servants have been working on the poll tax Bill to get it to the House, and that was before the Government added about 400 amendments. At the end of the day, they arrived at the figure of £53,057,231. That money is allegedly start-up money for the poll tax. It is supposed to help local authorities with the horrendous costs of introducing this quite outrageous poll tax Act. This tax will cost twice as much to collect as did the rates, and local authorities are said to need £53,057,231.

Our amendment seeks to take out the precise figure, because we wish to show that the sum allocated by the Government for poll tax set-up costs is inadequate. We also wish to ensure that the position is kept under review, which is crucial.

I know that the Minister of State visited Birmingham recently. Although I had a public meeting with Councillor Knowles last Thursday, I did not have a chance to discuss the Minister's visit with him. However, I gather from press reports that the Minister has promised to double the amount of money allocated to Birmingham for its poll tax set-up costs. I am putting words into the Minister's mouth, but that is what the press reports led me to believe.

Mr. Gummer: Perhaps to help the hon. Gentleman, I will say that I was dispelling a false comment that the community charge sum which had been provided in this part, which is a specific grant, was all that was coming, when he knows there is provision for twice as much in the normal RSG. Therefore, the total amount to Birmingham was about twice what had been expected. That is the only point that I was making, which I think was accepted by all hon. Members.

Mr. Rooker: I accept that, but it is no way near enough. I am not saying that the £53 million is all that the local authorities will receive.

The £53 million allocation is, I understand, based on a total of £110 million. The Government have decided that that sum represents the revenue costs to English authorities of poll tax preparation in 1989-1990. We are only talking about the start-up revenue costs and not capital outlay, which will involve considerably larger sums.

I presume that the Minister has gone through all the briefs that were used in Committee—more would have been done since then—and has seen all the detailed figures. Local authorities contend, however, that the £110 million underestimates the likely costs. The Government's defence —no doubt we shall hear more of it later on—is that the estimate is in line with the cost estimates made by Price Waterhouse. We have received information from local authority associations—we do not just dream up figures —which challenges the Government's estimates.

Price Waterhouse estimated that the cost to English authorities would be £108 million. The start-up revenue costs, however, were based on November 1987 prices, not 1988 or 1989 prices. Inflation has been running at 5·9 per cent. for the past 12 months and the gross domestic product deflator—I hate using the initials GDP because I think that it sounds bad to those listening to our debates —for 1988-89 has been predicted in the Autumn Statement at 6·26 per cent. That means that the Price Waterhouse estimate of £108 million should be £122 million to be worth the same, in real terms, by November 1989. That figure is 11 per cent. more than the sum recommended by the Government's consultants. Given that difference, it is reasonable to consider how Price Waterhouse reached its figure.

It is unfair that we did not have greater advance warning about this Bill, but, at this time of night, I shall not go into the detail of the Price Waterhouse report; rather, I shall give a summary of my criticisms of it. That report was based on a small sample of authorities. It rested on dubious assumptions and missed several areas of spending, which I shall elaborate upon if required. No allowance was made for preparatory publicity or the staff training required to administer the poll tax.

It is obvious that major publicity campaigns will be needed for the new Tory tax. Central Government have earmarked £1 million for publicity in England this year. I suspect that when the poll tax is implemented, that lot on the Tory Benches will have spent more than £1 million on glossy leaflets through front doors and on television advertising, usually with the subliminal Tory logo in the corner of the screen. In Scotland, the Government put a leaflet through every door telling people how good the poll tax was, which was printed in blue. Such was the neutrality of the Government's propaganda efforts in Scotland.

We know that the Government have earmarked money for publicity, but we appreciate that it cannot all be done centrally. In England, registration dates will vary and, therefore, each local authority will have to mount its own campaign to inform the people of that date.

Mr. Redmond rose——

Mr. Rooker: I shall give way to my hon. Friend in a moment.

In Birmingham, 16 per cent. of the adult population are from the ethnic minorities. I do not seek to draw the patronising conclusion that they cannot speak or read English, because in every household in Birmingham there is someone who can. There are people, however, who, after living and working in this country for years, still do not have a full command of the English language. One sees that not just among the ethnic minorities. Constituents of mine who came here in 1950 from Latvia could not get British citizenship under naturalisation because even today they could not pass an English language test. Local authorities will have to have special publicity, and languages other than English will have to be used. That will vary from authority to authority.

Mr. Redmond: My hon. Friend mentioned the vast amount of money that the Government are spending on propaganda in an attempt to brainwash and kid the public.

[Mr. Redmond]

Is it the local authorities that will have to spell out the truth about the poll tax, and will the Minister see that authorities that do so are not penalised and surcharged?

Mr. Rooker: I should not want my hon. Friend to misunderstand the position. Local authorities are debarred by the Local Government Finance Act 1988 from telling the truth about the poll tax because if they did so, they would be accused of putting out propaganda. That is outlawed under the publicity clauses in that Act. The Government will determine the form of the poll tax bills received by our constituents. It will not be up to the local authorities—they will not be able to tell the truth about the poll tax.

The Price Waterhouse report did not refer to staff training. It is unrealistic and bordering on stupidity to implement a major change such as this without staff training. The system will be heavily dependent on computers. That was demonstrated at local authority conferences; there was even a stall or two at the Labour party conference. Firms up and down the country are providing local authorities with their wares and equipment such as forms and computers.

The bailiffs are involved—everybody is involved. Everyone will make money out of the poll tax except our constituents who, by and large, will have to pay it to pay for the cuts that go to the well-off. Staff must be trained in the intricacies of the legislation. It is not a five-minute job. There was no estimate for staff training in the Price Waterhouse report, on which the Government based the figure of £53 million.

The local authority associations have been monitoring the likely cost to members, with a series of surveys. The sample is far bigger than that used by Price Waterhouse—it is over 300 compared with Price Waterhouse, which looked at 25 local authorities, when in England alone close on 400 will implement the poll tax. It is too early to say that all local authorities know what their exact final costs will be, but it is certain that, as implementation nears, the authorities will make more decisions and that final costs are likely to rise.

In the explanatory and financial memorandum to the Local Government Finance Bill, the Government estimated costs of £70 million to £90 million in 1989-90. That has already been raised by 57 per cent. Since the poll tax was presented to the House on 3 December last year, the likely revenue costs alone—not capital costs—have been increased by the Government by 57 per cent. The Price Waterhouse figures in real terms—the £122 million rather than the £108 million—show an increase of 74 per cent. on the original figure.

As authorities will be able to assess the final cost only when the tax is close to implementation, we should like some commitments from the Government, which we believe to be reasonable. The first is to keep the position under constant review, which is important. It is nothing personal, but the poll tax will become a living nightmare for the Minister in the next 18 months. Over the next 18 months or two years it will become a living nightmare for the Conservative party and the Minister will have to keep the matter under constant review.

I want the Minister to keep one narrow area of policy—the start-up and revenue costs to local authorities—under review. Clearly, the figures available when the Bill was published have been shown to be too low. The Minister should also make available whatever amounts prove necessary to launch the Government's flagship properly. If the Government do not launch it properly, it will sink. We do not want to poll tax to sink—oh, no. The Government have pushed it through the House, and the Government are going to get it rammed down their throats at the ballot box from now until they depart from office.

I could—I emphasise "could"—detain the Committee a lot longer going through all the other points that Price Waterhouse failed to take into account. The report lists unspecified assumptions, it refers to unstated formulas and it extrapolates through some unknown process. There is no explanation in the report about the extrapolations or the formulas. The report assumes that there will be no customer avoidance—that is, no evasion of the tax. But we know that there will be evasion.

The report fails to consider a wide range of material. It states that there will be no increase in the proportion of people paying by instalments. Frankly, the poll tax structure means that every citizen should pay the tax through 10 monthly instalments. That is the opposite of the present two half-yearly rate demands. The pressure will be on people to pay the whole poll tax in advance, as that is the only alternative. The idea that a professional firm of accountants, in assessing the likely start-up costs, did not assume that a bigger proportion of people would pay by instalments, shows that the firm is not living in the real world and did not take account of the legislation that it was asked to judge. There is no attempt in the report to underpin the figures on such things as efficiency savings.

However, I will not go into those matters in detail, although I could. I do not think that that would do the Committee justice, because as the weeks pass and the new Session starts, the Government will have nearly two dozen orders to present to the House, every one of which will be prayed against. We will deal with the poll tax week in and week out. This is just a skirmish, but it is an important narrow point that we are trying to get the Government to acknowledge.

The Government should give the commitments that I have asked for—that the matter will be kept under constant review and that, when they receive figures which prove that their figures were wrong, the Government will at least make good the balance to local authorities. Otherwise, a tax will be introduced which will cost 4p in the pound to collect and which is twice as costly to collect as the rates. On top of the 4p, we will have to spend even more money on the start-up costs. That is quite ludicrous. There is no earthly reason why local authorities should be penalised any more than the Government have already penalised them.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: After all the hours that we spent debating the poll tax in Standing Committee and in the Chamber it is good to see that nothing changes. The Government are still not giving the details underlying their assumptions and are still not telling us how the calculations are made. They are still producing figures which I suppose do much to try to support their case for the poll tax, but do little to meet the reality that local authorities across the country claim they will experience in, for example, implementing the poll tax and meeting the associated costs.

The figure in the Price Waterhouse document is a good example of the problem. The Minister listened to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker). Can the Minister refer to any authorities that have contacted him to say that they believe that the figures are reasonable and to give an idea of the likely costs of implementing the poll tax? Has any local authority given the Minister that message while he was going round the country talking to them and asking them how they will implement the poll tax? Certainly, in my part of the country that has not happened. Irrespective of its merits, the costs of putting the poll tax in place are higher than the amount that the Government have allowed. The cost will be higher than the specific figure that, most unusually, the Government have given in the Bill.

There must be a large question mark over the Committee's being asked to put into legislation figures that bear no relation to reality. The Government are unable to come up with detailed justification for those figures. To tell us that the Price Waterhouse report deals with the matter is hardly adequate.

We have heard about some of the problems, but, like the hon. Member for Perry Barr, I do not want to go into them in great detail. I support what he said about technical problems. One could run through a long list of areas for which the figures and the facts behind the assumptions that Price Waterhouse has made are not given. Price Waterhouse does not even tell us the figures for the examples that it has looked at. It will not let the authorities that it used judge the matter, look at the figures and comment on them. No doubt those authorities would find that useful.

How can the Minister justify the assumptions that Price Waterhouse made in reaching its figures? Those assumptions cannot be justified and therefore the Minister cannot justify the figure that is contained in the Bill. Paragraph 51 of the report says:

"There will be no 'customer avoidance' i.e. evasion of the tax".

I do not think that even the Government would pretend that that is true. In Committee we argued at length about the level of avoidance. Like many other hon. Members, I argued that it is likely to be very high, that a tax such as this is likely to be extraordinarily difficult to police, and that it will be difficult to stop people avoiding it. If we assume that the level of avoidance will be the same as that for television licences and car tax, or if we associate collecting poll tax with the difficulties of collecting rates, we see that at least some evasion will take place. The level of avoidance will be much higher than predicted.

How can the Government come forward with a figure that is precise, not to £1,000 or £100 but to £1? How can they reach so precise a figure using a report based on such assumptions? Paragraph 28 of the report says:

"The processes involved in administering a Community Charge are the same as those for a rate account, and hence authorities should be able to achieve their current workload ratio".

We all know that it is far easier to identify a house than to identify an individual, and that it is far easier to tax property than to put a tax on everyone, no matter how low his income. They will all pay at least something in poll tax. It is extremely difficult and there are high costs associated with that. It seems that the assumptions on which Price Waterhouse based its report made a low figure inevitable. One wonders whether they were the assumptions that the Government told Price Waterhouse to make so that they would get the answer that they wanted.

As the hon. Member for Perry Barr said, we are told that there will be no increase in the proportion of people paying by instalments. The poll tax payment system is different from that for rates. With the poll tax one is encouraged to pay by instalments. People may have to opt out of paying by instalments rather then the other way round.

The hon. Member for Perry Barr spoke about the missing areas. No account is taken of the need for publicity. How is a local authority to put the system in place if it is not able to tell people how it will work and to make sure that they are informed? Tory Members would be the first to complain if a local authority did not tell people what was happening, or did not tell them what the timetables for collection and registration would be. Equally, they and the Minister would be the first to complain if authorities were making a complete mess of implementing the poll tax because staff had not been trained adequately and were being asked to do things for which they had no experience or training.

We can only presume that the Price Waterhouse assumptions lie behind the figure used in the Bill. If that is the case, I cannot believe that the Minister can justify that figure. I hope that the Minister will accept the amendment, but if he cannot, he should bring forward an alternative, and explain how he will match the reality of the situation with the fantasy that we have so far had from the Government. At the very least, he should drop the pretence that the figures in the Bill bear any relation to the reality that local authorities will face.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): The Minister intervened in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), but he has not yet told us how he arrived at the exact figure that is in schedule 2 and is referred to in the amendment. One of the problems with the haste with which the Government have pushed through the Bill is that they have not thought it all out.

The Minister for Local Government gave me a written answer last week in reply to a question I asked about the cost of the introduction of the poll tax. In that reply, he mentioned the Price Waterhouse report, published on 23 June, and said that the report

"estimated preparation costs in 1989-90 in England and Wales to be between £99 million and £102 million"—

I stress "between" those two figures—

"for current expenditure, and between £125 million and £175 million for capital expenditure."—[Official Report, 2 November 1988; Vol. 139, c. 684.]

He went on to give the costs of annual expenditure for collection as "between" £379 million and £435 million, rather than the £200 million that it costs to collect the rates.

How does the Minister conjure up the figure in the Bill of some £53 million? I think that it has been conjured out of the air. As my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr and the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) have said, there are many flaws in the Price Waterhouse report and the way that it carried out its exercise, but even it did not give that exact figure.

Mr. Gummer: The figure is £53,057,231 because it was £55 million, but we have to take off the money that is destined for the rate-limited authorities. If it went in any other way, they would not get the money. We know precisely how much each of those will get, and if we take it away from £55 million, we are left with an exact figure. As to the £55 million, it is half the £110 million, because that is a specific grant to make sure that all authorities receive some money for distribution. The rest will be provision under the rate support grant. There is no difficulty about that.

As to the amount itself, it is true that it is within the range presented by Price Waterhouse, but if hon. Members do not like that, let me point out that it is more than the local authorities asked for. They can hardly object to that. Hon. Members suggested that the authorities knew best and it is clear that the Government have listened carefully to what has been said. Therefore, we have here a sensible proposal.

I am looking forward to the great detail of the debates about the community charge, because I shall be able to point out that 51 per cent. of households will be better off; that the poorest will be better off and that one in four of those who pay the poll tax will be helped. I use the term "poll tax" in this case because Opposition Members do not like using the term "community charge" as it reminds everybody that all of us will pay a bit towards the community services that are provided. Opposition Members like using the term "poll tax" for the simple reason that they do not want the public to know the truth about the community charge.

Therefore, I am looking forward to all those debates because in each one I shall be able to point out that for one Conservative tax, the Labour party proposes two taxes; for a sensible tax which makes sure that everybody pays a share and that those who need help will be helped, the Labour party wants two taxes, both of which would be extremely expensive to implement. Yes, I am looking forward enormously to those debates because every single one will show that the community charge is extremely sensible and that the more that people understand it, the more they will support it as they did in the Odsal by-election, which is what Opposition Members hate. That is why we will go on supporting the community charge.

Mr. Rooker: I must make one comment on what the Minister has said, because it cannot be allowed to pass. The Minister must learn that households do not pay poll tax; people pay poll tax. He can juggle the figures for households as much as he likes, but the fact is that on his own Department's figures, 14 million adults live in the households that will gain under the poll tax, whereas 19 million adults live in the households that will lose.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: I am sorry to have to return to the point, but the Minister's response has illustrated his weakness on this matter. On every other issue that has been raised, the Minister has given us a reasoned argument, presented his case and answered the points that have been made. Although we may not have agreed with him, he has attempted to answer the points raised. However, on this occasion he has not attempted to do so and he has not justified the figures that he is writing into the legislation. He has not told us whether he honestly believes that there will be no evasion in a world in which there is no publicity at a local level and no training of the officers who are to put the system into existence. I cannot believe that he honestly believes the figures from Price Waterhouse. He has not answered our points, so I beg that he comes back to put his case to the House.

Mr. Gummer: Clearly, the hon. Gentleman has not been listening. I have answered directly. First, we asked an independent group to give us a figure, and we have accepted that. Secondly, we have taken a higher figure than the people who will implement the measure asked for. What better answer could there be to the questions that have been asked?

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Mr. O'Brien: I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 15, line 19, leave out sub-paragraph (2) of paragraph 8.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): With this, we may discuss the following amendments: No. 13, in page 15, line 21, after 'which', insert

'reflects the residual responsibilities of a local authority in relation to advanced further education and which—'.

No. 14, in page 15, line 28, leave out sub-paragraph (2) of paragraph 9.

Mr. O'Brien: This group of amendments refer to the formula in the Bill. Amendment No. 14 refers to schedule 2(9)(2), which deals with that part of the formula referred to as U. Will the Minister define U and explain its real purpose? If she can do so, it might help to speed up the proceedings.

Mr. Virginia Bottomley: This is a complicated group of amendments, and I hope that the House will bear with me as I explain the way in which T and U tie together. The adjustment for polytechnics, once they are funded by the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council, is given effect in the Bill by deducting the total contributions of local authorities to advanced further education pools in 1988-89, and adding back that expenditure—currently financed through the advanced further education pools —that will remain to be financed by local authorities in 1989-90. The deduction is referred to in the Bill as T and the continuing expenditure falling to local authorities as U.

The adjustment T, to which amendment No. 12 relates, is required to obtain estimates of local authorities' expenditure in 1988-89, excluding expenditure on advanced further education. The Bill specifies the deduction of T precisely by reference to figures sent by the Department of Education and Science in a letter to chief education officers in March 1988.

Amendments Nos. 13 and 14 relate to the specification of the addition U, and involve different considerations. The Bill sets out the principles that govern the calculation of U, but leaves the details to be specified in the forthcoming rate support grant report for England, which will help to clarify some other areas of uncertainty. Amendment No. 13 seeks to describe the purpose of the U factor, but although it is apparently helpful, it is both unnecessary and technically incorrect. It is intended that the U adjustment will allow for differences in the relative costs of courses such as science or the arts, on the same basis as we now allow for such variations.

Two options for such variations have been canvassed with local authority associations. The options are quite complex and take account of the very wide range of courses that will still be provided by local authorities. Amendment No. 14 would remove restrictions on the size of U. That is undesirable, even though in practice the amendment may have very little effect.

I am sorry not to have done full justice to the complexity of the subject. I hope that the forthcoming consultation paper will clarify certain other areas for the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien).

Mr. O'Brien: I am grateful to the Minister for her explanation, although it leaves some confusion about the U factor. Amendment No. 12 would remove from the Bill what appears to be an unnecessary provision, and I wish to question the Minister further. Schedule 2 sets out a formula to determine an authority's notional expenditure for 1989-90, on which its grant entitlement will be based.

As local authorities will no longer be responsible for advanced further education, an adjustment to their notional expenditure is therefore required equivalent to their current contribution to the advanced further education pools. That is factor T. The amount of the adjustment is that set out in the March letter, which is referred to in the Bill, from the Department of Education and Science to local authorities. Therefore, schedule 2(8)(2) appears to be a belt-and-braces provision. It states that there is no doubt as to the accuracy of the amounts stated in the DES letter and that no further revision of it shall affect the definition of T in the formula.

Although the Minister briefly referred to T in the formula, paragraph 8 highlights the possibility of further revisions to authorities' contributions to AFE pools. Therefore, what arrangements are to be made for compensating authorities whose eventual contributions to the AFE pool are higher than the T factor in the formula? If expenditure is higher than the formula, surely the local authorities involved should be compensated.

Amendments Nos. 13 and 14 ensure that the purpose of factor U—this is the unknown—are set out in the Bill, rather than left as an arbitrary element. The Minister referred to it as an arbitrary element. Opposition Members prefer the matter to be set out in more detail, as it can vary with different education authorities.

The purpose of leaving out sub-paragraph (2) of paragraph 9 is to discover the purpose of the upper limit of £3 million. Again, how is that limit arrived at, and what is its real purpose?

The reason for the amendments is that the formula in paragraph 4 is of crucial importance in determining the grant that individual authorities will receive in 1989-90. It is essential that they should be comprehensively compensated and subject to the normal process of judicial review, rather than the arbitrary letters which stand for such amounts as the Secretary of State may see fit.

Factor U appears in the formula for education authorities. Sub-paragraphs (4) and (5) of paragraph 4 of schedule 2 are believed to relate to that part of advanced further education for which education authorities will continue to be responsible when the Department of Education and Science takes over the running of the polytechnics in April 1989. Therefore, there is a division between the two Departments—the DES and the Department of the Environment.

There is nothing in the Bill to confirm that interpretation. As I pointed out, unlike TE, T and CC, the factor U is not defined. That is unsatisfactory. It does not do justice to the explanations that are being given, because as it stands, U can be almost any amount that the Secretary of State wishes it to be.

Although adding the words in the amendment would not materially affect the Secretary of State's intention, it would provide a feeling of greater security for local authorities. Similarly, we are given no reason why the amount should be no greater than £3 million. We should be given some explanation for the magical figure of £3 million. If it represents, say, the maximum amount of residual AFE by any local authority, why not define U in the appropriate manner? Looking at the Bill as it stands, no local authority could determine what its relevant amount will be in 1989-90. Therefore, it cannot guess how much grant it will get.

The Secretary of State should be made to explain why these numbers appear in the Bill. That was the first question that I put to the Minister, because I believe that if we had the information in the first instance it would save a good many more questions being asked in the form of our amendments. I hope that the Minister will attempt to fill in the blank spaces and give us some idea what the formula is about.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I shall speak briefly, out of deference to hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Normanton (Mr. O'Brien).

Contributions to the advanced further education pools may subsequently vary from the amounts included in the letter of 29 March 1988 from the Department of Education and Science. It would, however, be wrong to revise our deduction in respect of contributions to advanced further education pools, as T as specified in the Bill is consistent with the reported expenditure underlying the determination of the relevant amount for 1988-89. Paragraph 8(2) is necessary to achieve the required certainty about T.

As hon. Members will readily agree—those of us who aim for a system of no taxation without comprehension, which my right hon. Friend would like, have been sorely tested—the options being considered are quite complex, and take account of the wide range of courses that will still be provided by local authorities. It would have been inappropriate to include the full details of such an adjustment in this Bill, but it is right that we should seek powers no wider than is strictly necessary. Paragraph 9(2) therefore places limits on the size of the adjustment U. Those limits, however, will allow us to adopt either of the options that have been discussed with the local authority associations. There will be further information in the forthcoming rate support grant settlement, which I hope will lead to more clarity.

Question put, That the amendment be made:

Schedule 2 agreed to.

Clauses 4, 5, 6 and 7 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

New Clause 1

ADJUSTMENT OF BLOCK GRANT

'(1) In relation to the years beginning in 1987 and 1988 if it appears to the Secretary of State that the aggregate amount of block grant to which local authorities would be entitled in accordance with the Rate Support Grant Report or any supplementary report for the year differs from the aggregate amount available for that grant in that year he shall adjust the amount payable to each authority (whether by increasing or reducing it) so as to reconcile those aggregate amounts.

(2) An adjustment under this section may be made in accordance with principles applicable to all local authorities.

(3) Section 1(1) to (4) of the Rate Support Grants Act 1987 shall not have effect for the years beginning in 1987 and 1988.'.—[Mr. Rooker.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Rooker: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

It may help hon. Members who have come late to this Committee to know that this is a Second Reading debate not just on the new clause but on the Bill. The consequence of the new clause would be the expenditure of £500 million, just as the consequence of the Bill would be to cut from local authorities £500 million that they could reasonably have expected to receive. I shall not repeat my Second Reading speech, although I have it here and I could be tempted——

Sir Peter Emery (Honiton): Circulate it.

Mr. Rooker: Perhaps I should do that.

I shall repeat a couple of points about the £500 million and then deal with an item that I did not mention on Second Reading. The thrust of the new clause is to require the Secretary of State to distribute all the block grant provided for in the rate support grant settlements. Hon. Members on both sides of the Committee and those in local government know that the House has approved rate support grant settlements.

The effect of the Bill is to reduce by £500 million the money that will be paid to local authorities. We think that that sum should be distributed to local government, and that is the thrust of the new clause. The evidence tells us that not all the £500 million would have been paid out and that there would have been a holdback, but, as I said on Second Reading, the local authorities have agreed to split the difference. They would settle for £250 million of the holdback being distributed to them in 1988-89. That is a firm proposal by the authorities to the Government, and it has not been met with a considered response.

The Government might respond to the new clause by saying that the powers under clause 1(9) permit the Secretary of State to distribute the additional grant, but that would be a discretionary act. The new clause would make the distribution mandatory. The Government have said, in effect, "This is rough justice. We have fixed a date. It will be tough for the losers but good luck for the gainers." It is alleged that the results of the rough justice in 1988-89 might be compensated for in 1989-90, for the Government have said that all the grant will be distributed in that year. That merely reinforces the local authority view that the Government had no intention in 1987-88 and 1988-89 of distributing the full amount of block grant that had been voted by Parliament to support local authorities. I emphasise that the £500 million has already been voted by the House. Authorities had a reasonable expectation that they would receive the money.

I said on Second Reading that this is not a party political matter when it comes to losers. In 1988-89, Conservative-controlled authorities stand to lose £134 million, Labour-controlled authorities £157 million, minor party-controlled authorities £4 million and independent authorities £3 million. The authorities that do not have an overall party control will lose the substantial sum of £210 million. The joint boards will lose £17 million. Those are the figures for one year, but the Bill applies to three years. On Second Reading, I concentrated in part of my speech —this would not have been realised by those who read the press reports the following day—on the effect of the Bill on the police authorities, which will be subject to substantial potential losses. I spoke of an overall loss of £18 million.

It may be said that we know what we mean, but not everyone will understand that the transport authorities come within the terms of the Bill.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman referred on an earlier occasion to the sum that he claimed the police authorities would lose. He did not mention that they could gain that sum only by making savings that would amount to £30 million. I ask him to tell the House of the savings that the transport authorities would have to make if they were to gain the grant that he is now asking us to put into the system.

Mr. Rooker: To the best of my knowledge, none of the police authorities has been accused of engaging in creative accounting. No Minister has said that they have been doing what it is alleged that local authorities have been doing. Indeed, it is true that some authorities have engaged in what is described as creative accounting, but that is not illegal. Of course, that has upset Ministers, which in turn has caused their rigidity over the dates of 6 and 7 July.

I do not want to go back to the police, but the Northumbria police authority, which is one of those special authorities that one can identify, made representations late in September that, because of significant budget problems experienced by the authority in 1988-89, efforts were made to reduce the outturn expenditure in 1987-88, with the intention of increasing block grant entitlement and thereby securing a greater level of balances. That is important for bobbies on the beat in Northumbria. As a result of the savings achieved—because it did not fully realise what the Government were going to do—this authority has lost approximately £400,000 in grant. I alluded to the fact that this authority stood to lose more than £400,000 and I could show exactly how that £400,000 was lost.

I shall use my figures and, if the Minister does not like them, it is up to him to give figures to rebut them. Police authorities are adversely affected by the Bill, as indeed are the transport authorities. Not all of them are affected negatively, but I intend to concentrate on one that is especially affected negatively.

Mr. Gummer: I want to clear up what I believe is a mistake in the hon. Gentleman's mind. He talks about this £500 million, but in order to get that money it would mean considerable savings of £1·2 billion—savings which local authorities would not produce, have not produced and could not, in his view, produce, although I believe that they could. The hon. Gentleman suggested to the Committee that money was being taken from police authorities, but he never suggested how they would make a saving of £30 million in order to get that money. In fairness, he should explain that. If he does not want to do so for the police authorities, perhaps he could tell us how much, in aggregate, transport authorities would have to save to receive the extra grant that he says is being taken from them.

Mr. Rooker: All that intervention proves is what I said a few moments ago: the Government never intended that this money voted by Parliament should go to the authorities. The Minister is saying that it is impossible for them to save and cut their budgets to get any of the £500 million. I repeat that that £500 million is not new money. The House approved that that money should go to local authorities, whereas the Minister has just said that it will be impossible for them ever to receive it. Of course, they were never intended to receive it, but no Minister—not this Minister, because it was not his responsibility—ever had the guts to stand at the Dispatch Box and say that the holdback was not available. The House can approve what it likes for local government, but the £500 million was not available. That being so, local authorities would not have had any expectation of receiving the money. It is fine that the Minister's view is that it is impossible for them to get it, but all that shows is that the local authorities were right when they believed that the intention was for them to be short-changed.

I want to concentrate on the West Midlands transport authority. I make no apology for doing so, because it is the first time in today's proceedings that I have referred to the Birmingham area in which my constituency is situated. I regret that the authority leadership was not informed until about Thursday of last week, because of the communication problem which is caused by having joint boards where there are lead authorities for a function covering, in this case, seven different authorities.

Communication cannot be that good when Bills are introduced in the fag end of a parliamentary Session and rollercoastered through without proper scrutiny. I make no complaints about the West Midlands passenger transport authority, or the lead authority on transport in the West Midlands, but what I am faced with at present is the fact that, because of the Bill, the West Midlands passenger transport authority stands to lose £8·9 million in grant over three years. It is not all to be lost in one year, but over the period 1986-87, 1987-88 and 1988-89. It reasonably expected to receive that money. West Midlands is by far the biggest loser. I understand that the Greater Manchester authority will gain about £5 million.

Approximately 50 per cent. of the budget of the West Midlands transport authority is taken up by concessionary fares—£31 million covers concessionary fares for pensioners and approximately £5 million covers concessionary fares for schoolchildren. Therefore, £36 million out of a budget of £65 million is taken up by concessionary fares. In the West Midlands county area, not the regional area, 400,000 pensioners enjoy the benefit of concessionary fares. Because of the unexpected loss of grant, for which the authority has been unable to budget, and without the ability to change its planned budget—it cannot put up fares—it will be impossible to maintain the concessionary fare structure in the west midlands.

I am not familiar with Suffolk, but I suspect that pensioners in that region do not get concessionary fares.

Mr. Gummer: They do.

Mr. Rooker: Generally speaking, there are no concessionary fares for pensioners in the Tory shires. Such fares are mostly available in the big cities only, and they represent a basic difference between Labour and Conservative control. I am pleased that such a progressive move has been taken in Suffolk and I can only assume that there is no overall control of that authority.

Mr. Gummer: It is strongly Conservative.

Mr. Rooker: Well, that is fine.

Why is the Minister introducing a Bill that will deprive my constituents and those of my colleagues who represent the west midlands of their free bus passes? It cannot be denied that, when the Secretary of State began to legislate on transport, we always said that concessionary fares were at risk. We said that, under the new transport regime, it would be impossible for an authority to maintain concessionary fares. We were told that it would be okay, and that we were running scare stories. If so, why has the West Midlands authority been singled out? No other transport authority has been affected in this way.

It is not a scare story to say that pensioners could potentially suffer. I am not saying that such fares will be abolished; their provision could be cut in half, such fares could operate one day a week or in the mornings only. There are enough bureaucratic restrictions on bus passes as it is. They were introduced in Birmingham some 30 years ago in the teeth of opposition from the then Conservative Government—Birmingham pioneered concessionary fares for pensioners.

There are pensioner Members of this House who use their passes on London Transport and, of course, they receive salaries. They are the very people whom the Chancellor is after with his new-found desire to target any concession received by a pensioner that is not already means-tested. In the west midlands, in common with elsewhere, those fares are not means-tested. As such, they are easy prey for the Government.

It would be unacceptable if there were any move against concessionary fares in the west midlands, whether by cutting the hours or reducing the days on which they operate. It must be said that such a move would not be the fault of the West Midlands passenger transport authority,

[Mr. Rooker]

West Midlands Travel, or of any of the seven metropolitan district councils in the west midlands. The fault lies with the Bill and the Tory Government.

Mr. Gummer: The fact is that, if the West Midlands passenger transport authority had produced a budget at the correct level in the first place, it would have lost nothing. Indeed, if all authorities had produced in the first place the budgets that they should have produced, all £500 million would have been available to them, but the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) tried to suggest that there might be a means whereby, in the past few weeks, by adjustments of one sort or another, by changing the date or something similar, and not having produced sensible budgets or returned sensible estimates to the Department of the Environment, the £500 million could have been saved. The hon. Gentleman has been rumbled. If he had not moved the new clause, he would not have been rumbled so clearly.

In the debate last Monday, the hon. Gentleman said that, for example, Bradford would have been able to get a considerable extra amount—£3·7 million of grant. He did not mention that the only way in which the council could so so was if it could budget for a £20 million cut in its expenditure. That would have been possible and the council could have done that sensibly if it had budgeted sensibly in previous years and, indeed, in the budget for this year. But the hon. Gentleman suggested that the council could have made that difference in the few weeks over the edge of the date that we were talking about. Therefore, the hon. Gentleman applied hypothetical figures to a hypothetical situation and produced a wrong answer.

Today the hon. Gentleman is saying that, if there are any cuts in the services provided by the West Midlands passenger transport authority—he admits that others will not be in that position—people must blame the Bill. That is not so. They must blame the poor budgeting of that transport authority. If it had run the services according to needs, it would have been able to obtain the maximum grant and not lose any grant.

The hon. Gentleman cannot now say that, although the people have not made the savings and did not have the savings in the budget, and although they did not try to do what they were supposed to do, they must now have the money as well. We know why the hon. Gentleman says that. It is because his answer to everything is more money. But who pays? Many of the very pensioners whom the hon. Gentleman wants to have the concessionary fares; many of the people who are asked to pay rates and taxes are poorer than some of those who have the concessionary fares. Sometimes it is worth remembering that those fares are spread across a large number of people, distinguished from the rest of the population merely by their age. But that was decided by many of the hon. Gentleman's friends, and no doubt some of my friends take the same view. It is a reasonable decision, but they cannot say that it is the Bill's fault rather than that of the authority's budgeting.

In the new clause, the hon. Gentleman shows that he wants to insist that authorities which, through lack of prudent budgeting, were not able to see the savings come through earlier, should somehow still get the taxpayers' money that they could have got, had they budgeted from the beginning, and kept to that budget in the way that the Government propose.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Gummer: I shall give way in a second, although the hon. Member—[Interruption.]—has not been here during our debates.

I say to the hon. Member for Perry Barr that that was not a proper way in which to end the debate. If one looks at the overall settlement, at the supplementary figures, which are now being discussed, and at the 9 per cent. increase in the grant that will be available in future, one sees that there is no question of the taxpayer or the Treasury making a profit. I remain convinced of that. It would not be proper for us to pay local authorities sums that they have not earned by sensible budgeting.

Mr. Terry Davis: I thought that the Minister referred to the hon. Member for Bromsgrove. I have no idea whether the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Sir H. Miller) has been present during the debate. I do not represent Bromsgrove; I represent part of Birmingham. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that hon. Members are entitled to come to debates on clauses that interest them?

I have been in the Chamber throughout the debate on the new clause. It interests me very much because, like my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker), I represent part of the west midlands and my constituents will be affected if the West Midlands passenger transport authority loses £8·9 million as a result of the Bill. The Minister told us that the West Midlands PTA would lose that money only because it has not engaged in what he described as prudent budgeting and has failed to put forward a sensible budget. In the Minister's view, what would have been a sensible budget for the West Midlands PTA to adopt, in order not to lose the £8·9 million?

Mr. Gummer: That is a decision for the PTA. All I am saying is that it did not put forward a budget which would result in the accretion of grant that it wanted. It decided that it did not want to do it that way. That was a perfectly reasonable thing for the PTA to do. However, it cannot now turn round and say that it wants that sum of money irrespective of the fact that it has not met the requirements for it.

I did not mention Bromsgrove. I am perfectly well aware that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Hodge Hill (Mr. Davis) is not the hon. Member for Bromsgrove. He was once, and he lost the seat. The hon. Member for Hodge Hill might consider it very interesting that in this debate the only people who have discussed the figures are the hon. Members who represent the one passenger transport authority which loses by the date under discussion. Earlier, Opposition Members suggested other dates. However, I must state that other PTAs gain by the date. The date cannot be construed as an attack on PTAs in general or on concessionary fares.

The new clause is not a suitable way of asking the taxpayer to foot a bill which he would not be able to foot except where local authorities had met the requirements that were perfectly clear at the beginning of the year. The West Midlands PTA decided in its wisdom not to meet those requirements.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I heard the Minister say that the local authorities were losing money because they had not made realistic budgets. That is unfair. I had hoped that we would hear answers during the debate on new clause 1 to the points raised on Second Reading, when we explained that many authorities were losing out badly because of the dates.

It is not good enough for the Minister to say that the authorities did not get their figures in on time or that in his opinion the budgets were unrealistic and therefore it is just tough luck on those authorities. The Minister must know —although he was not personally responsible—that the Department of the Environment has changed the rules, regulations and dates continually.

It has been impossible for many years for local authorities to have budgets that they can present in an orderly fashion to elected members and then ensure that they applied for the budgetary year in question. It is not surprising that at the end of a particular financial year a local authority would look at its budgetary outturn and discover that it was different from the estimates. Therefore authorities have always been able to come back to the Government and point that out. Now, with a set date of 6 July, a number of authorities will lose very badly, and I explained to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on Second Reading that that was not fair.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) referred to the West Midlands passenger travel authority. A number of other authorities will lose out badly because of the date that has been set by the Government. I refer once more to the examples that I quoted on Second Reading of Greenwich, Southwark and Brent. I will not go through all the facts again, but I hope that the Minister will respond as he did to the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Perry Barr about the police authorities, and consider the London authorities.

Greenwich approved its account for 1986-87 on 6 July, but did not notify the Department of the Environment. The DOE assumed that Greenwich spent £102 million when it actually spent only £93 million, which means that the council will lose £1·2 million in grant. I do not know whether the Minister thinks that local authorities that do not fulfil all the provisions of their budgets by an arbitrary date are at fault. If he approaches the matter like that, where is the order in financial accounting for local authorities? How can they possibly budget sensibly under such conditions?

As I said to the Minister on Second Reading, he should be prepared to look sympathetically at local authorities that will clearly lose under the provisions of the Bill. I understand, but perhaps the Minister will tell me if I am wrong, that local authorities made representations to the Secretary of State to the effect that, since they will not be able to recoup grant holdback by reducing expenditure, £250 million of the holdback in 1988-89 should be distributed. Has the Secretary of State seriously considered the proposals put forward? If he has not, the local authorities were wasting their time in putting them forward. There is not much point in us trying to make a case if the Secretary of State does not listen.

The Minister must know, even in the short time that he has been responsible for the Bill, that there will be some injustices. New clause 1 at least gives him an opportunity to redress some of those. I hope that even at this late stage he will be prepared to change his mind.

Mr. Rooker: Obviously, the Minister has a closed mind. I repeat that Parliament has approved the money, so it is not a question of money having to be raised from taxpayers. Parliament has already approved the rate support grant settlement. Prior to 1987-88, all the block grant money was paid out. New clause 1 seeks to introduce what was known as grant recycling. It is only in 1987-88 and 1988-89 that the Government have separated the block grant so that there is a provision in the settlement in the main year of £9·471 billion. The amount that they distributed on the basis of the estimates was £8,960 billion, leaving grant held back by the Treasury or the Department of £511 million. Until two years ago, in the normal course of events that would have been recycled.

All we are saying is that the new clause is justified on the grounds that the authorities will not be able to recoup some or all of the grant holdback by reducing the expenditure that would normally feed through into the grant calculations. That was what normally happened, but the process is no longer available to the authorities. Anyone would think, to hear the Government, that local authorities keep overspending on their estimates, but that is not true. In 1984-85, the actual expenditure of local authorities was £98 million lower than estimated. In 1985-86, the expenditure was £431 million lower than estimated and in 1986-87 it was £285 million lower than estimated.

Local authorities can justifiably claim a long run of years during which the actual outturn, which is never known until the end of the year, was lower than the estimated expenditure. All that the authorities want is credit for that.

I repeat what I said about the West Midlands passenger transport authority. Given the way that the Bill was brought in, the announcement in July and the rigidity with which Ministers have acted, it is clear that they have not been prepared to countenance any change in the Bill. Clearly the Bill has not been scrutinised as it would have been in a Committee upstairs. Earlier in the debate, the Minister let the cat out of the bag. Quite clearly, it was never intended that the £500 million should go to local authorities, police authorities or transport authorities. It is clearly going to go back to the Treasury, which is what was intended in the first place.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

Question accordingly negatived.

Bill reported, without amendment.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

12.21 am

Mr. Tony Banks: I am glad to have caught your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There was not a great deal of competition on this occasion, but I believe that it is necessary to keep Ministers here as they probably do not have anything more useful to do than listen to my speech.

It is a great pity that, despite our attempts in Committee to persuade the Minister to accept our amendments, he remained implacable and refused to see the justice of our case. He must know that a great deal of injustice will come about as a result of the Bill, that arbitrary dates have been set and that some local authorities will gain a great deal, although we have not made great play of that tonight. It is a case of good luck to those who gain, but we are most concerned with those who, unfortunately, lose. In local government, resources are hard to come by and if any authority loses, that must be a matter of regret for Opposition Members. A number of local authorities in Greater London are losing. Greenwich, Southwark and Brent, all of which I mentioned on Second Reading and on Report, will lose as a result of the Bill.

As the Minister has not seen fit to change his mind or the terms of the Bill, in the light of our amendments, our opposition on Second Reading should be sustained on Third Reading. We are all a little older and Conservative Members are none the wiser. A Bill that we opposed on Second Reading has simply moved nearer the statute book and, therefore—I am sure that Opposition Front Bench Members agree with me on this occasion—we must oppose the Bill on Third Reading.

The Government argue that the Bill paves the way for the poll tax. It does so by breaking the link between grant and expenditure and, in the process, ends resource equalisation. It starts the process whereby the Government believe that no authority is any richer or any poorer than any other authority. The Bill changes the rules retrospectively, as we have always maintained. Many authorities will suffer grant losses as a result through no fault of their own, merely because, once again, the Government have changed the rules.

I do not know whether the Minister has any local government experience. Perhaps he could indicate by moving some part of his body; any part will do, preferably his head. I take it, to judge by his somnambulant position, that he is either dead or has never served in local government——

Mr. Gummer: I had the pleasure of serving on the Inner London education authority.

Mr. Banks: I am sure that it was not a pleasure for the Minister, or for the teachers, pupils and others in the authority.

Let us assume that the Minister did sterling service when he was on ILEA. That must have been many years ago, when central Government did not interfere in the affairs of local authorities in the way in which this Government have done since 1979, since when interference has escalated. I had hoped for a response from the Minister to the point I made when discussing new clause 1, which was that these days it is virtually impossible for any borough treasurer or finance director to produce the sort of budget that council members—or the Department of the Environment, come to that—would want to receive. Expenditure after a budget has been set can never be forecast because of the rule changes that the Government keep introducing. Interest rates, regulations passed in this place and other factors combine to make certainty impossible.

In these circumstances, it is unrealistic of the Minister to blame local authorities for not being able to keep to budgets agreed at the beginning of the year. The Minister knows that that is unrealistic, yet he has worked on that assumption throughout proceedings on the Bill, which seems grossly unfair.

The Bill contains discretionary powers that the Minister may exercise, so I repeat the case even at this late stage: some local authorities, through no fault of their own, will lose badly under the Bill. The penalty for that will be paid by ratepayers. This is typical of the arrogant way in which the Government treat local authorities.

Collective and individual grant penalties will remain in place, even if no longer justified—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] At least I can still read at this late stage—a facility which I doubt whether many Conservative Members could exercise.

Grant calculation for 1989-90 will be arbitrary and based on no principle apart from the need to prevent the Government from losing court cases.

The Bill is as bad as it was on Second Reading. The Minister refused to accept our reasoned amendments. I urge all my hon. Friends to vote against Third Reading.

Mr. Pike: Having sat through most of the debates last Monday and today, I believe that there is general recognition of the need for some sort of Bill to take us through the transitional period from the old rate support grant to the new poll tax. We oppose the new tax, but accept the need for a transitional arrangement.

I shall vote against Third Reading because I wholly oppose the Government's handling of the Bill. There was no reason for pushing it through at the end of this parliamentary Session. It was quite wrong of the Government to do that. Legislating in unnecessary haste often causes mistakes. There was no need for this Bill at this time. It could have been presented and debated in the proper manner at the start of the new Session, when all the relevant factors could have been discussed.

Opening the debate last Monday, the Minister said that this may not be the best way forward or the best solution to our problems, but that the Government thought it the right one. He also accepted that the Bill involved rough justice. But rough justice is indefensible: we need a Bill that is fair, and seen to be fair.

There may well be faults with the Bill. We recognise that the Government will use their majority to force through the Third Reading, but if there are faults the Government will have to return to the House during the next Session with different proposals.

The track record of the Secretary of State for the Environment shows how often he is wrong. It was the same when he was Secretary of State for Transport. Time and again he had to return to the House with retrospective legislation, often because he had been proved wrong in the courts. The Government may have to admit that they have made mistakes in the Bill and that they were wrong to push it through at this late stage.

We could have dealt with the Bill in a few weeks and made sure that everything in it provided a proper protection for local government. Like my hon. Friends, I still believe in local government—unlike Conservative Members, who want only to kill and knock nails in the coffin of local government.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I want to speak on Third Reading—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh no."] You will be aware, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that I have been in the Chamber for most of the debate, although for most of that time I was on duty and did not have the opportunity to say a few words. I shall be brief—[Interruption.] This is not a filibuster.

My hon. Friends the Members for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) and for Burnley (Mr. Pike) made true statements about this unfair Bill. Indeed, there have been many unfair Bills since this Government took office. The Bill does not allow local authorities to represent the people in their areas and to provide the necessary services. There are to be yet more cuts in local government.

I heard the Minister talking about the Bradford Conservatives and what they will do in future. They have set out their stall. The Minister is a loser—

Mr. Patnick: A what?

Mr. Haynes: He is a loser. He came to Nottingham last week during the by-election—

Mr. Tony Banks: Tell us what happened.

Mr. Haynes: I will. It was a Tory seat, but on Thursday we won it and took control of the city council. We will right many of the wrongs done by the Tories. The Nottingham Tories intended to do the same as the Bradford Tories.

Mr. Banks: I congratulate my hon. Friend on the Nottingham result, which is wonderful news and, no doubt, is the prelude to much good news.

Is my hon. Friend aware that just over a week ago in the London borough of Newham the Labour party again won two by-elections? The council has now returned to having 59 Labour councillors and one Democrat. It is a Tory-free zone.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Let us get back to the Third Reading of the Bill.

Mr. Haynes: I am speaking to the Bill, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That comment was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West.

Things are changing. There is a clear sign in Nottingham and Newham that the people realise what is going on. There is no doubt that Govan will prove another point. [Interruption.] The Minister is laughing. Last Thursday, we knocked the grin off his face, and we shall continue to do it time and again until the next general election, when the people of this country realise what the Government have done to local government. They have done it to my local authority, too. My local authority is fair. It tries to provide the proper services for the people it represents. But, by cutting back, that lot deny local government the right to provide proper services.

The other day, I told the Minister that we lose finance every time there is a pit closure. I do not care what he may say at the Dispatch Box. We are losing money because of the Government's policies. I blame the Chief Whip, too. I shall drag him into the argument, because he makes sure that his Tory colleagues are present to vote for the Government's policies. Why does he not let his colleagues go home if they wish to, so that we can win now and again? [Interruption.] I am conscious of the time. There is a fight on television at a quarter to 4.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): Hear, hear.

Mr. Haynes: The hon. Gentleman says, "Hear, hear." He told me that the fight was over in the fourth round, but it has not been held yet. However, the fight is on at a quarter to 4, and I aim to see it.

The important point is that the message is getting across to the people loud and clear. The Government have to go. They will go at the next general election. They can take the grins off their faces. Their grins will be knocked off. I say that quite sincerely. The Government's policies, particularly in relation to local government, are denying elected representatives the freedom to do the right thing on behalf of the people. The Government are cutting finance here, there and everywhere. They pour money into the pockets of the Tory rich. Tory local authorities look after Tory boroughs, but they do not look after Labour-controlled boroughs.

The Secretary of State makes me sick when he seriously criticises Labour-controlled local authorities. They are doing the right thing on behalf of the people. That lot are denying Opposition Members the right to do the right thing, and look after the people who need services.

I heard several of my hon. Friends talk about elderly people's homes in local authority areas. We in Labour-controlled local authorities are providing a first-class service for those who need it, particularly the elderly. They have made their contribution, and we should look after them properly. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer denies them their rights. [Interruption.] Conservative Members can laugh. I shall sit down in a minute. Those who are youngsters will be elderly one day. I am not far from retirement. You and I will draw the old-age pension, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I know that I am a little older than you. It is all right; do not get worried about it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will speak for himself and will not presume my future.

Mr. Haynes: I shall withdraw the comment about your future, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and stick to my own. But one or two more hon. Members—on the Conservative Benches as well—are coming up to retirement age, and they are going to enjoy that pension. I want to remind that lot over there that I paid for it, and so did the people who were being denied when the Chancellor stood at the Dispatch Box today. Those people bought their pensions, and the Chancellor should be coming to the Dispatch Box and doing right by them.

The elderly people of this nation have been through two wars, and they worked very hard in heavy industry, particularly the industry that I came from, the mining industry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. None of this seems to have much relevance to the Rate Support Grant Bill.

Mr. Haynes: With respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker, we are providing services in the community for elderly people, or are supposed to be. I am only adding a bit more about the Chancellor's denial of them at the Dispatch Box, and the way that the motley crew who sit on the Treasury Bench come to the Dispatch Box every now and again denying this, that and the other.

I am speaking on behalf of the people in my constituency, and my hon. Friends have been doing the same. But we did not hear a great deal of that from the other side of the Chamber. All that Conservative Members were doing was supporting the Minister. He was given a lesson or two upstairs when he was in the Department of Employment. I gave him one or two biblical lessons, which was a bit strange to him as a Member of the Synod. I tried very hard. The Minister has been given a lesson or two on the environment and a lesson or two on employment, and will continue to have lessons, but he does not listen. He ignores what he is told and ploughs on in his own sweet way, denying people their rights.

I am standing here asking for those rights, particularly for the people in the very low-income groups who really need it. The right hon. Gentleman stands at the Dispatch Box saying that they are the people he is going to help, but he and the other Ministers are denying them their rights to benefits and services.

Mr. Skinner: My hon. Friend is doing exceptionally well, but I remind him that the fight is on at a quarter to 4.

Maternity Services (Derbyshire)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (Derbyshire, West): In a previous Adjournment debate, I had the opportunity to talk about the future of two schools about which my hon. Friend the Minister and I felt strongly—Ecclesbourne school and the John Port school in my hon. Friend's constituency. We were successful in saving the sixth forms of those schools, and I hope that I am as successful tonight.

There has been much discussion of the maternity services of Ashbourne and Belper as provided by the Chevin unit at Babington hospital. I know that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) has told my hon. Friend the Minister of his wish to contribute to the debate, and I can say that I am speaking this morning with the full support of my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox), who shares the concern that is felt about the future of the Ashbourne maternity unit.

It would be wrong to assume that the unit serves only Ashbourne. Instead, it serves a wide area around Ashbourne, part of which extends across the border into Staffordshire. The unit is a highly valued part of the community, as is borne out by the massive public response against the health authority's proposals. The protests that I have received have been concerned mainly with geographical and practical considerations, for the unit is about 15 miles from Derby. That may not sound a great distance, but in the winter it would be difficult for many to travel to Derby. The health authority has referred to average journey times in some of the documentation which it has issued. It has accepted the times of 82 minutes from Mayfield and 74 minutes from Ashbourne to the city hospital at Derby.

I am concerned about the way in which the health authority's proposals have been introduced. It is intended temporarily to close the unit, or units, on 18 December. That is outrageous and disgraceful. It pre-empts any decision that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health may make. I cannot see my right hon. and learned Friend overturning the authority's decisions following its decision to redeploy staff. The authority should wait until my right hon. and learned Friend has announced his decision on its proposals.

There is no doubt that the authority faces a financial problem, and part of it is set out in the consultation document. Part of the document states:

"There are a number of possible risks facing the Authority which would make the position described above worse. First, it is possible that we shall have to provide funds to meet the cost of some pay awards."

We know now that that is not the position.

"Second, it is already apparent that the increase in Local Authority rates for 1988/89 is greater than 4·5 per cent., which is the figure that the Authority has available to fund it, and this will increase the financial problems of the Authority by £234,000."

As my hon. Friend the Minister is well aware, my constituents and I live in the highest rated shire county in Britain. There is no doubt that that rating has added to some of the problems that have confronted the health authority.

I am speaking of a unit that is entirely separate from other hospitals. There is another hospital in Ashbourne —St. Oswald's—to which it was planned to move the unit early in the 1990s. I welcome that plan. It is right that the unit should be moved there. The move would make St. Oswald's more of a community hospital. At present, it cares mainly for the elderly and undertakes the tasks of a small minor casualty unit. If it were possible to take the maternity unit and put it on the site of St. Oswald's, I believe that would greatly help the area and greatly improve the local facilities. The health authority could then sell the land on which the Ashbourne maternity unit is situated, and thus raise a considerable capital asset.

I notice that in its consultation documents it talks about this unit along with a plan for the closure of other maternity units, and it says that it expects the sale of the units to raise some £200,000. I believe that it is erring on the gravest possible side of caution, as the Ashbourne site alone is likely to fetch more than £200,000. Therefore, the health authority will have capital available to improve some of the facilities at St. Oswald's, which I believe is vital.

A short while ago, I visited Derby city hospital and I would like to place on the record a few facts about that hospital. It has come in for some criticism from various sources, but I can only say that I was tremendously impressed with what the City hospital has to offer. Nobody can argue that it does other than hold all the facilities that a high-tech birth requires. I saw babies in the hospital who had been born at 24 weeks, and the care that can be given to those babies at that hospital is unbelievable. No one is saying, or has ever said, that that sort of facility can be offered at St. Oswald's. What the people in Ashbourne are saying is that, a week before Christmas, before the worst of the winter and before the Secretary of State's approval is the wrong time to close the unit.

Not so long ago my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary was kind enough to come to my constituency and participate in "Any Questions". My hon. Friend knows the sincere feelings of parents in that area. She has said that quite often we manage to get along with the procedure without going to Ministers, and that we usually carry people along when we talk about changes. If the health authority proposed a proposal to move the maternity unit up to St. Oswald's, my hon. Friend would have local agreement, my full support, and the health authority—as it obviously is not my hon. Friend's decision—would have my full support. That is what we are anxious to see happen.

A number of aspects worry us, such as the likelihood of an increase in home confinements, which is confirmed by the health authority's documents. One matter that especially worries me is that it does not say in its documents that it is closing the maternity unit and taking it to Derby to improve the maternity service, but the reason given is that the closure should take place on financial grounds. I find that difficult to accept, because, although the health authority has listed the savings that it believes will be made, it does not make any allowances for any increase in the ambulance service, and at present it is saying that all that would be needed is 1·32 full-time community midwives. At the end of the day, I do not believe that that will prove sufficient.

I should like Trent regional health authority to ask the district health authority to conduct a special review of health care in the Ashbourne area in relation to the position of St. Oswald's in the community. St. Oswald's is a community hospital; let us see it used and become more a part of the community than it is at present. Let us see the leagues of friends from the maternity unit and St. Oswald's making a positive contribution to a community hospital in the Ashbourne area. I think that that would get a lot of support.

I plead with the Minister, and through her with the Southern Derbyshire district health authority, not to make the closures until adequate provision has been made or until the need for provision has been assessed and the Secretary of State is sure that the closures should go ahead.

The consultation paper about Ashbourne, which was published by the health authority, discusses selling off the unit, but it also says that, presently,

"It is not intended to dispose of the site".

I am particularly concerned by such words.

In southern Derbyshire, we have a great deal of new hospital accommodation, but we also have a lot of old accommodation. That accommodation is a liability on the health authority and it is leading to many of the authority's present financial problems.

Babington hospital is based in Belper. It is a valued local facility and the Chevin maternity unit serves a number of surrounding districts, including Crich. The average journey time from Crich to the new city hospital will be 100 minutes.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mrs. Edwina Currie): That is not so.

Mr. McLoughlin: My hon. Friend disagrees, but that figure was derived from the Southern Derbyshire health authority's public transport access arrangements; it is not my figure. The return fare will be £4·68. The journey time would not be as important if the journey was made once, but what about the husband who wants to visit his wife a number of times so that she does not feel isolated in the city hospital?

With the Ashbourne facility, the health authority knows that it has a unit to close, which it can sell to make a capital gain. That is not the case with the Chevin maternity unit, which is part of the Babington hospital, which mainly cares for the elderly. I want such hospitals to be part of the community rather than serving an isolated sector of it—the elderly. They should offer a range of patient care. That is why I wanted to bring this matter to my hon. Friend's attention.

Although the health authority may have the power within the rules to press ahead with the closures on 18 December, I do not think that that is right. I believe that that cuts short the political process that allows representations to be made at the highest level, and I believe that that is wrong.

I urge the health authority to reverse its action and not to go ahead with the closures until it has had the agreement of the Secretary of State. The health authority should go one step further and reach a consensus so that the Secretary of State does not have to make a decision. We should make a local decision about the hospitals rather than ask the Secretary to the State to make it.

1.9 am

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the hon. and learned Gentleman have the consent of both the Minister and the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin)?

Mr. Lawrence: Yes. I am grateful for the opportunity to intervene in the debate.

Although Ashbourne maternity home is not in my constituency, I have to tell my hon. Friend the Minister that there is very strong feeling against the closure in east Staffordshire, for that home, with such an excellent reputation, serves many of my constituents. They have written to me from Ramshorn, Mayfield, Uttoxeter, Leigh, Bramshall, Ellastone, Marchington, Denstone and Rocester. The South-East Staffordshire community health council has received over 100 letters from members of the general public in my constituency, all opposing the closure. It has received representations, as I have, from the women's institutes, local doctors and local midwives.

Of course the removal of a local facility always produces an adverse response, but the proposal is particularly galling and unnecessary. When Leek and Wirksworth maternity homes were closed in recent years, the argument for their closure was that Ashbourne maternity home would provide the services that had been closed down in those villages. When the snows pile up and the roads of south Derbyshire become treacherous in the winter, as they do almost year upon year, mothers and visitors will have to make a road trip of 35 to 40 miles because there are no maternity facilities in Uttoxeter.

Undoubtedly, new facilities at Derby city hospital will be of the highest standard, but what consolation will that be for mothers who have a rapid labour and have the risk and misery of worrying about the delivery while they make the long journey to Derby on winter roads? What about those of my constituents who have no access to private transport, when public transport is not always available just when a baby is about to be born or the mother is in distress?

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin) has made an excellent case. He is a great example of a caring Member of Parliament working at his best. He has my full support. He also deserves the support of my hon. Friend the Minister who is, as she well knows, my own Member of Parliament. I hope that she will be able to respond positively to our demands. Of course I appreciate that it may not be feasible to keep open Ashbourne maternity home in all the circumstances—my hon. Friend, and the district and regional health authorities, have analysed that. But if that is so, there is a sensible and practical alternative in transferring the facility to St. Oswald's hospital, which is nearby and is excellent.

I support the request of my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West for a full review of the hospital and the health facilities in his area. The Government have done wonders for the National Health Service. They are building up facilities all over the country which were run down under the previous Labour Government. They are spending more money than ever before. They are paying the nurses more than ever before. They are providing care and help undreamed of in years gone by.

Why is it necessary to spoil such an achievement and the appreciation for that achievement that is demonstrated in election after election by my constituents, by over-centralisation, when the retention of village hospitals is perfectly feasible in some circumstances such as this and when that becomes socially desirable? It is a particularly cruel stroke if this maternity home is to be closed before that review takes place and before Christmas 1988. I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to think again.

1.14 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin) on winning the ballot, and I noted with pleasure the intervention from my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence). They are my close neighbours in the midlands and no one could have better hon. Friends or neighbours. I am grateful for the help and support that they give me in my work here and the way in which we work together in the midlands.

I note that my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West takes a keen and active interest in the health and welfare of his constituents. He tells me that he took part in a delegation in July to discuss health matters affecting his constituency with the then Minister for Health. He has written 25 letters and tabled 20 questions on health-related matters since the general election, and he has certainly kept me busy.

I know the Southern Derbyshire district health authority very well, as it covers my constituency. It also serves the residents in the constituencies of Erewash, Derby, North and South and Amber Valley. It looks after the best part of 500,000 people and is one of the largest health authorities in the country. It is covered by the Trent regional health authority, which is also an enormous region. Its spending rose from £369 million 10 years ago to more than £1,000 million last year, an increase of about 14 per cent. in real terms. This year, Trent's initial cash allocation was increased by a further 6·3 per cent. to over £1,050 million, well above the national average increase of 5·7 per cent. As a result, Trent's poor funding in the past has now been corrected and it has moved from 92 per cent. of its target 10 years ago to 97 per cent. under the RAWP allocation.

We should not under-estimate the impact of the Trent regional health authority or of the National Health Service generally on local life. More than 660,000 in-patients were cared for in Trent hospitals last year and total employment in the regional health authority stands at about 75,000 whole-time equivalent staff. The amount of money contributed to the local economy by the health authority is considerable.

The South Derbyshire health authority has had a momentous year and we should not under-estimate how much it has achieved. It has opened three major new developments at Ilkeston community hospital, Derby city phase I—which includes a maternity unit—and the Derbyshire royal infirmary stage II which was opened in May. During 1988, 644 old beds have closed in the area and have been replaced by 585 new ones.

That has led to much improved occupancy rates, which were hovering around the 50 to 60 per cent. mark in some of the major specialties. It has also led to spectacular improvements in the waiting times and lists, improvements which we hope will continue. The authority is in the middle of a painful and obviously very contentious process of rationalising hospital services. Since 1986, 10 hospitals have been replaced or closed. The health authority voted to close another six in September, including the four under discussion today.

My hon. Friends will be aware that most of the decisions were settled locally and did not come to Ministers. The closures are only partly due to finance. In a number of cases, the decisions were taken because the area was well endowed with small old Victorian hospitals whose economic lives would soon come to an end.

The district had an initial allocation this year of £100·7 million. That represents almost a 6 per cent. increase in cash limit over the previous year. When I became a Member of the House, the authority was spending £78 million. When my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West became a Member in 1985-86, it was spending £86 million. As I have said, this year the initial allocation is £100 million and the authority has access to other funds. That clearly shows that South Derbyshire health authority has received a great deal more money this year than last year and is much better endowed than before. Therefore, I do not think that the health authority has a strong case for arguing that it should have a lot more money. It has been allocated a much higher share from Trent's increased resources.

At the end of 1987-88, the district had an overspend of £2·2 million and at the beginning of this year it faced a deficit of £2·7 million. Most of that was due to overspending at the Derbyshire royal infirmary. Having opened new facilities at the DRI, the authority found that people liked them and activity levels jumped by about 8 per cent. in one year. That was part of a 23 per cent. increase in activity levels over the past five years.

The authority has considered its health indicators, the most recent of which relate to 1986-87. They show that the total proportion of acute patients dealt with as day cases in the Southern Derbyshire health authority was barely 9 per cent. and was as low as 2 per cent. in some specialties. However, in the health authority that covers most of the constituency of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton—the South-East Staffordshire health authority—the overall figure for day cases was 22 per cent. and in some specialties it was heading for 50 per cent. As a result, the average cost per patient in the South-East Staffordshire health authority area was £514. In Southern Derbyshire, it was £738. Given the patient mix, that was 12 per cent. higher than expected. The health authority is well aware of these figures. They do not mean that, automatically, Southern Derbyshire is inefficient, but they raise questions that need to be examined, and I understand that the health authority is doing that.

The health authority has much success under its belt and should be proud of that. After a slow start under general management, the pace quickened in the last year or so, and major changes are now under way. While I and my constituents probably have fewer hospitals to visit, the standards in those hospitals are immeasurably higher, and modern facilities of the highest standard are now at last available to Derbyshire people after years of losing out somewhat to the south of England and, more recently perhaps, to Nottingham and Sheffield.

The district health authority is looking after more people better and faster and getting them home more quickly. With the arrival in Southern Derbyshire of Trent's trend-setting personal services philosophy, which I saw for myself in Nottingham recently, I am sure that the health authority's public image will improve. Certainly, its presentation of some of its policies could improve: I am sure that we all agree on that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West asked for a review of the services around Ashbourne. I know that the regional health authority has taken heed of his concerns. It tells me that it spent some time discussing with the Southern Derbyshire health authority the health needs of Ashbourne and its surrounding villages. It has agreed to look specifically at Ashbourne and the surrounding communities with representatives of the local community and to look at the broad shape of in-patient and out-patient services, as well as the wider network of community services. In so doing, the health authority will look specifically at the longer-term role of St. Oswald's hospital, and that will give it the opportunity to discuss the ideas that my hon. Friend has so eloquently put forward.

As I am sure my hon. Friends will realise, the closure of peripheral maternity units puts me in some legal difficulty. If the community health council persists in its opposition to closure, these matters will come for decision to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. I take on board what was said about temporary closure. That is quite commonly done, and quite legal, although I realise that it can infuriate local people. It does not influence the judgment of my right hon. and learned Friend on these matters, and he will base his decisions entirely on what is needed for patients, mothers and babies in that area.

In the short time that is left, I should like to place on record one or two facts. The 1987 figures for perinatal mortality in our area are not as satisfactory as any of us would hope. Perinatal mortality, which is mortality within one week of birth, in England and Wales in 1987 was 8·9. In Trent, it was 9·3 and in Southern Derbyshire it was 9·6. Our new figures to be published nationally tomorrow will show that mortality among our babies has fallen again to a new all-time low. We all hope that that will happen in the Southern Derbyshire health authority area as well.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton spoke about the problems of travelling. I can tell him that people in labour are already travelling. I am advised that, of mothers admitted to local maternity units for births but later transferred to a district maternity hospital in 1987, Ashbourne had 20, Ilkeston had 13, Heanor had eight and Belper had 68. In the period April to December 1987, 27 of those women from the Babbington unit at Belper were transferred during labour. I do not know whether my hon. and learned Friend has ever tried travelling in an ambulance during labour. I can tell him that it is the most uncomfortable journey that one can have. When my right hon. and learned Friend takes his decision, it would be wise to take that sort of information into account.

Question put at and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-three minutes past One o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Mathematics and Physics Graduates

1. Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what new plans he has to attract more mathematics and physics graduates into teaching.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. John Butcher): We have had in place for more than two years an action programme to attract more mathematics and physics graduates into initial teacher training. It has reversed the earlier trend of decline in recruitment. This action programme continues. We monitor recruitment trends closely and we will not hesitate to take further action should it be necessary.

Mr. Field: Does my hon. Friend appreciate the considerable concern felt by industry and commerce about the number of school leavers going to university to study mathematics and physics? Will he assure the House that he will examine carefully every proposal from industrialists to ensure that our education system produces more actuaries than artists and more physicists than philosophers?

Mr. Butcher: I am glad that my hon. Friend did not refer to an avalanche of accountants or a surfeit of solicitors. I have a great deal of sympathy with his point. What matters is that we have an adequate supply of teachers who are qualified to teach mathematics and physics to advanced level so that the admission tutors of universities can be pleased with the quality of applicants for places.

My hon. Friend will be encouraged to know of the £1,300 bursary for trainee teachers of mathematics, physics and craft, design and technology. In a previous incarnation I chaired a committee that involved the new partnership programme in bringing £43 million extra expenditure into higher education, in conjunction with the private sector, to attack the shortages in exactly these disciplines.

Mr. Roy Hughes: Does the Minister recognise that when our bright young graduates see all the rewards that are paid to so-called yuppies in the City it is no wonder that they decide not to become mathematics and physics teachers? Does not the solution lie in the Government's hands—to ensure that these teachers are properly rewarded on a scale commensurate with their role in society and their importance to the nation?

Mr. Butcher: I agree with the hon. Gentleman's last sentence. Our success in attracting appropriately qualified teachers will be a function of two factors; first, the overall level of teachers' pay, which has risen by an average 31 per cent. since March 1986, and by 13 per cent. in real terms —a major achievement. Secondly, an able, newly qualified mathematics or physics teacher can expect, because of the shortage, a rapid rise in promotion and pay. He or she also has the additional opportunity to tap into incentive allowances of between £800 and £4,000 a year, so the framework already exists.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: Bearing in mind the effect that the present shortage is bound to have and is having on the quality of young people entering engineering and science courses, and concerns expressed by the CBI and the headmasters' conference, among others, will my hon. Friend do all that he can to encourage the entry and re-entry of people into this profession and not even rule out possible differential payments in grants and salaries?

Mr. Butcher: The question of flexibility is one that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science will consider in due course with all those who advise him. We must look very hard at the fact that 400,000 teachers are employed, but that there are 400,000 qualified teachers in what is referred to as the pool of inactive teachers—another unfortunate acronym, the PITS. It is that particular category of teachers currently outside the service that we must closely examine when considering incentives to return to the profession, particularly in the shortage subjects.

Mr. Straw: I offer our congratulations to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on his transfer.

Does he accept that his reply is one of desperate complacency that does not begin to match the scale of the problem? Applications for physics, mathematics and chemistry are down 10 per cent. this year, and half the teachers of mathematics and physics were not qualified at degree level to teach those subjects.

Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that when his hon. Friend the Member for Wantage (Mr. Jackson), in his capacity as Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, stated in a recent document that "a major argument is brewing up about whether we should be aiming to produce more teachers, in order to maintain staff-student ratios at their existing high point,"

the argument to which he was drawing attention is one inside the Department of Education and Science and with the Treasury, as to whether teacher shortages can be solved by recruiting more teachers or by making classes larger. On the side of which argument is the Secretary of State?

Mr. Butcher: I may tell the hon. Member that we treat this question very seriously and it is a matter of concern, for the reasons which my hon. Friends have already adduced. As to recruitment and entry into the profession, the hon. Gentleman is correct in saying that in terms of training applications, there was a 10 per cent. reduction in mathematics applicants and a 12 per cent. reduction in physics applicants. By the same token, recruitment into the profession last year was up by 33 per cent. in mathematics and by 49 per cent. in physics. Nevertheless, it is the question of applications that we must address.

As the hon. Gentleman knows, we shall be bringing forward programmes on in-service training. I believe that the package of measures that we have in place will tackle the short-term difficulties, but we have a common cause in tackling the medium-term problem.

Student Support

2. Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on his plans to bring forward changes in the system of student financial support with effect for the academic year 1989-90.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Baker): We announced last Friday that, subject to parliamentary approval, mandatory awards to students will be increased by 5 per cent. in the 1989-90 academic year.

Mr. Beith: Even that award will not make up for the decline of more than 20 per cent. in student awards since the 1970s. How are we to evaluate that against the background of the recommendation of the Minister responsible for higher education, vouchsafed to journalists, that eight named universities should be able to charge an extra £500 in teaching fees? Is that another example of journalists getting it all wrong, or is that the real agenda?

Mr. Baker: My proposals for changes in student maintenance will be announced shortly. I deplore the fact that discussion documents were leaked. There is a great debate on the funding of higher education, both here and overseas. There is also a growing desire among institutions for greater independence. The Government have no proposals for students in receipt of mandatory awards to contribute part of their tuition fees, but higher education institutions have a legal right to charge tuition fees, and to prevent their doing so would require legislation.

Mr. Baldry: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that ours is the most generous system of student support in the Western world and that every other developed country has some form of student loans system? In those countries there is greater participation from all backgrounds in higher education than there is in this country. If we want increased participation in, and access to, higher education, would it not make sense to introduce some form of top-up loan scheme in addition to basic student grants?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend has anticipated somewhat a statement that I shall shortly be making concerning student maintenance support. My hon. Friend fired three target rounds: we do have the most generous system of student support in the world; we do spend a larger proportion of our gross national product on higher education than any other country in Europe; and yet we still have relatively low levels of access. The proposals that I shall shortly announce will try to address that problem.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: How will the Secretary of State address the central problem that far too few 16-year-olds stay in full-time education? Any proposals on student grants should address that problem. In my constituency, 24 per cent. of those who get good O-levels or GCSEs do not stay on in education, and all the Government's proposals to increase fees and for loans send one message to that group of youngsters—that education is expensive and that it is not for them. How will the Secretary of State address that problem, particularly when he continues to cut the grant each year?

Mr. Baker: We are uprating the grant next year by the forecast rate of inflation for the last quarter of next year. I encourage youngsters to stay on at 16 and 18, and this is probably the case across our political spectrum. I am glad to say—the hon. Gentleman should recognise this—that there are 200,000 extra students in higher education than there were when we came into office.

Education Reform

3. Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on progress in introducing the national curriculum.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): In accordance with my right hon. Friend's declared timetable, work on the core subjects—mathematics, science and English—is now well advanced. Work on the other foundation subjects will follow. We intend to introduce the national curriculum progressively from autumn 1989 onwards.

Mr. Latham: Does my hon. Friend recall from correspondence that head teachers in rural schools in my constituency are worried that the introduction of the national curriculum will be adversely affected by the new rules on charging for educational visits and expeditions? Will she confirm that it cannot have been any intention of Ministers to reduce educational opportunities in that way?

Mrs. Rumbold: The Government's new proposals on charging will not affect either the principle of free education in our schools or the national curriculum or other curricular subjects. However, there have been some considerable misunderstandings about the Government's new charging proposals. Before the Education Reform Act was passed, some authorities were charging for some activities in schools. Those authorities were taken to court and the court ruled against them. The local authorities then asked the Department of Education and Science to clarify the situation and after considerable consultation on the Education Reform Act we have attempted to fall in with what local authority associations suggested to us on charging for activities in schools. There are three general rules: first, charges for board and lodgings may be made; secondly, charges for any activities that take place wholly or mainly out of school hours may be made; thirdly, indivdual music lessons may be charged for. For other visits to theatres or museums during school hours, parents may be asked to make voluntary contributions. If the parents so decide—they have a choice about whether to do so—those activities can continue.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Does the Minister recall the Secretary of State giving a guarantee that testing at 11 would not become a means of reintroducing the 11-plus through the back door? How is that compatible with the system in the borough of Trafford, which still has grammar schools and the 11-plus? It is important that we have a proper answer to that.

Mrs. Rumbold: Any school that currently administers the 11-plus as part of its admissions policy will be able to continue to do so. That will not cut across the assessment processes that will be part and parcel of the introduction of the national curriculum, where all children will be assessed at the ages of 7, 11, 14 and 16. The tests that are taken at 11, 14 and 16 will be aggregated and published.

Mr. Boswell: Does my hon. Friend accept that many teachers now welcome the national curriculum, but that there is some anxiety among professionals about the amount of time available for training teachers in their new duties, particularly those who also have to carry out teaching responsibilities in the smaller schools?

Mrs. Rumbold: Yes. My hon. Friend will be glad to learn that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced two extra days to allow teachers to complete adequate in-service training for the introduction of the national curriculum.

Environmental Research

4. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has instructed the research councils to increase their planned future expenditure on environmental research since 27 September.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Robert Jackson): There is no need for the Government to instruct the Natural Environment Research Council to spend money in this way. That is its job. The council will, of course, benefit from its share of the substantial increase in the science budget which was announced last Tuesday. This will be decided by my right hon. Friend, after he has considered the advice of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils.

Mr. Ross: With 95 per cent. of the earth's circulating carbon within the biological feedback processes in the oceans, why is the Natural Environment Research Council £1 million short of funding for the Discovery cruise in the north Atlantic next year?

Mr. Jackson: There are two different kinds of environmental research which are supported through the NERC. Basic research into the environment is funded by the Department of Education and Science. Expenditure on that has increased by more than one third in real terms since we came into office. Of course, the Secretary of State has to consider the Advisory Board for the Research Councils' advice, to which I have already referred. As for environmental research for specific purposes, the requirements of Government Departments and of industry are constantly changing and priorities constantly have to be reassessed. There has been a reduction in such commissioned work at the NERC, but I emphasise that the council has maintained its great strength in basic environmental research.

Dr. Bray: Of the £120 million increase in expenditure on science and technology in 1989-90 which the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced, how much is accounted for by the 3·5 per cent. increase in costs in the universities and research councils above the level expected a year ago? How much is accounted for by the £47 million increase in earmarked programmes for other than scientific purposes, of which only £3 million is for AIDS? Does that not leave a real increase of only £24 million in the budget for the science base?

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Gentleman is always carping. On this occasion he is trying to look a gift horse in the mouth. I can assure him that this gift horse has real gold teeth. I prefer the language of Sir David Phillips, who described the settlement as very encouraging indeed.

GCSE

5. Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the progress in GCSE examinations.

Mrs. Rumbold: The recent report from Her Majesty's inspectors of schools on the introduction of the GCSE shows that it is off to a good start, due in large part to the hard work and commitment of teachers. The GCSE examining groups, in partnership with the new School Examinations and Assessment Council, are already viewing syllabuses and procedures to ensure that next year is better.

Mr. Leigh: Does my hon. Friend agree that the only real and objective test of the GCSE is how those who sat it this year perform at A-level in two years' time? Will she therefore ensure that there is no reduction, watering down or tampering with A-level standards? GCSE must not be seen as a Trojan horse to mask any reduction in our drive towards excellence.

Mrs. Rumbold: I do not accept that A-levels should be the only test of how good the GCSE examination is, as many other objective tests can be applied. None the less, I agree that it is very important indeed that A-levels must not in any sense be changed or watered down, so that young people who have taken the GCSE can demonstrate beyond doubt how excellent the introduction of the new examination is.

Mr. Flynn: Does the Minister agree that GCSE pupils should be used to tackle the chronic skill shortages that exist in this country, particularly in one area? Does she agree that one skill shortage that is capable of embarrassing the Government, and to which pupils can be drawn, is the special lack of skill displayed by top Treasury civil servants in their failure to operate tape recorders?

Mrs. Rumbold: I am sure that the new GCSE examination will enable all pupils who complete the two-years of course work and take the end of the year examinations to follow all the skills that will be required by future generations seeking work in this country.

Mr. Pawsey: Does my hon. Friend accept that the GCSE results for the past year have been very gratifying indeed and give the lie to all those who criticised the introduction of the examination some 18 months ago? However, does she agree that perhaps it lacks some of the essential rigour that is necessary to ensure good A-level results?

Mrs. Rumbold: I agree with my hon. Friend that all the carping about the GCSE being introduced too quickly, without enough money and without sufficient support has been proved wrong. In large part, a great deal of the success has been due to the hard work and effort of teachers and pupils and the support that the children have received from their parents. I believe that the A-levels will come out well, just as we expect, as a result of the good preparation that the GCSE has given to the students taking it.

Mr. Steinberg: I agree with the Minister. If it had not been for the hard work and dedication of the teaching staff, the GCSE would have been a failure, because the Government did not provide enough resources. Can the Minister guarantee that in next year's round of negotiations more resources will be provided for books and equipment so that the GCSE will not depend solely on the teachers' dedication?

Mrs. Rumbold: The GCSE is the best resourced examination that has ever been introduced in Britain. Its success has as much to do with the excellent resourcing as with the determination of the teachers.

City Technology Colleges

6. Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the latest information available on proposed sites for city technology colleges.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: The CTC programme continues to make excellent progress. Over £30 million—an unprecedented sum—has already been pledged by industry. Much more will be raised.

Mr. Mitchell: Does my right hon. Friend accept that his CTC initiative is widely welcomed by parents, who see it as an excellent chance for spreading choice and opportunity in education? Will he ensure that the areas that have not yet benefited from the CTC programme will be considered seriously as a means of equipping today's children with the skills that they will need in tomorrow's labour market?

Mr. Baker: The CTC programme is a great success. Kingshurst CTC opened in September and Nottingham and Teesside CTCs will open next year. Only today, plans for a CTC in Bradford have been announced. Further announcements will be made shortly.

Mr. Flannery: Despite the lyrical account of CTCs by the Secretary of State, is it not true that they have run into great difficulties? They are not popular and the amount of money coming from private industry is so insufficient that the Government have to fall back on taxpayers' funds. Why does the Secretary of State not admit that, instead of selectively choosing people for the CTC's, giving them special financial favours and taking money away from the

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman lives in another world. When I visited the Kingshurst CTC on Friday there was a board on the door showing the names of the 64 companies that have supported it. The hon. Gentleman said that the CTCs are not popular. There was over-subscription for places at Kingshurst CTC by 2:1. Now, Nottingham and Teesside CTCs are leafleting their areas and I am sure that there will be substantial over-subscription by the parents in those areas.

Mr. Dunn: Will my right hon. Friend accept that the CTC initiative should be encouraged to the maximum extent? Will he confirm that local education authorities are entitled to set up similar institutions if they so wish and should be encouraged to do so?

Mr. Baker: I thank my hon. Friend for the help that he gave in fashioning the policies for the CTCs. He is right. If local authorities co-operate—more local authorities are now beginning to do so—it eases the process of establishing CTCs. CTCs will be popular and successful schools.

Mr. Fatchett: Does the Secretary of State recall his words when he launched the CTC initiative? He said that the majority of the money would come from private sector initiative. Will he now tell us how much private sector money is involved in the Bradford CTC? Is it the case that, like all the other CTCs that the Secretary of State has announced, the majority of the money is to come from the taxpayer, not from Dixons and the private sector? Is the Minister reluctant to give that figure because it will show how cheap it is for the chairman of a company such as Dixons to buy a knighthood from the Government?

Mr. Baker: I say to the hon. Gentleman that that is a most malicious and unfair allegation. Perhaps he would like to repeat it outside the House, where the person whom he slanders could no doubt take appropriate action. The hon. Gentleman asked about raising funds. We asked sponsors to provide £1 million, which is the initial amount. More than £1 million has been provided for Bradford. In the case of Kingshurst, the £1 million has grown to £2 million and Kingshurst is now searching for £3 million. That is what happens. Once the CTCs are established, more companies support them. It is about time that the Opposition stopped attacking CTCs and recognised that they will be successful and popular.

Inner London Boroughs (Education Functions)

8. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received from inner London boroughs regarding the level of the specific grant-aid for 1988-89 to cover work preparatory to becoming education authorities.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Government are making available specific grant of £3 million in 1988-89 for the preparatory work of the inner London councils. Some councils have queried their allocations within this figure, but we think that it will be adequate to meet reasonable preparatory costs.

Mr. Hughes: Southwark will spend £460,000 this year in preparing for the handover. The three inner London Tory boroughs have forecast overspends of 32, 64 and 92 per cent. In view of that, how can the Minister of State justify giving each inner London borough only £240,000 when her Department clearly said that it was committed to a successful handover? What should rate-capped boroughs do? Should they skimp on education provision, or should they cut other hard-pressed services?

Mrs. Rumbold: For this financial year, we think that we have given adequate money, £3 million, to enable councils to carry out the preparatory work that they are required to do. In case there is any query about next year's allocation —the £10 million that the Government have given for 1989-90—we have invited Southwark council in particular to give estimates of what it thinks it might spend. If it does that before Friday, we will consider the estimates.

Mr. Spearing: Does nc the tentative nature of the Minister's reply illustrate th enormous problems that will face inner London boroughs? In view of what her right hon. Friend said in debate, will she look carefully at the organisation of special schools in central London? If the boroughs have to look after them instead of having a consortium, which is presently being suggested, will not the expenses be even greater and the efficiency of the special schools service much diminished?

Mrs. Rumbold: I think that it will give the hon. Gentleman some pleasure to know that we are carefully monitoring the progress of each of the 12 London authorities that are preparing plans. They are working together to seek the best solution for special schools. Not one of them has presented the sort of problems that the hon. Gentleman might have hoped to see. They all welcome taking on responsibility for education and appear to believe that they can deliver it better than ILEA.

Natural Environment Research Council

9. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the chairman of the Natural Environment Research Council; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Jackson: The new chairman, Professor John Knill, took up his appointment on 1 October and my right hon. Friend has yet to meet him. However, I met Profesor Knill informally in September and we discussed a range of topics concerning the council's activities.

Mr. Wallace: I am sure that the Minister is aware of the breeding failure of a number of sea bird species in Shetland. Finding the causes of that will require a considerable amount of research, not least into the availability and abundance of sand eels. Will the Minister assure us that he will encourage the NERC to play its full part and that, along with other Departments, his Department will provide resources for that research? If the North sea project were to extend to parts of the sea north of the Wash, does he agree that some of the information from that might help?

Mr. Jackson: Decisions on these matters are made by the Secretary of State only on advice from the scientific community and the research councils, once they have had their allocation of funds. My right hon. Friend has not yet received advice from the Advisory Board for the Research Councils about the disposal of the considerable additional new resources that have been provided. Those resources have not yet been allocated to research councils. I am sure that note will be taken of what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Schools (Opting Out)

10. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received about schools wishing to opt out of local authority control; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: My Department has received inquiries from a large number of parents, governors and others about the opt-out provisions of the Education Reform Act. The Electoral Reform Society has now arranged, or is arranging, ballots of parents at a number of schools considering grant-maintained status.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my right hon. Friend give an early and favourable reply to the governors of St. James' church school in Bolton, who are fighting to save their school from threatened closure? Is it not ironic that Bolton's Labour council should choose such a popular school to close when 99 per cent. of the parents in an 83 per cent. turnout voted so convincingly to seize the Government's lifeline?

Mr. Baker: I am sure that my hon. Friend will appreciate that I cannot comment on a particular school, because when the proposals come to me I have a quasi-judicial position and I have to examine the proposals carefully. I assure him that if the governing body puts forward these proposals, it has to go through a statutory procedure. I shall deal with the matter—when the statutory period of two months has elapsed—as quickly as possible. I am delighted that so many schools are seriously considering grant-maintained status. This is all part of our great reforming programme. Competition will make for better quality. I understand from the Electoral Reform Society that 15 ballots are expected before Christmas.

Mr. Lewis: When the Secretary of State receives the application from St. James' church school, will he note that £1·5 million must be spent on that school because of a ground fault on which the school is built, which is why the local authority took the decision to close that school? Will he also take note of the fact that 700 plus places are surplus to requirements and have been the subject of a report by the Audit Commission? Will he condemn the opportunism of the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham)?

Mr. Baker: I am not prepared to condemn the opportunism of one of my colleagues, who is making a constituency point. It is because of these factors that the holder of my office cannot, and should not, make any comments about a particular school, because the matter has to come to him and he will have to look at it in his quasi-judicial role.

Mr. Madel: Will my right hon. Friend always look sympathetically at schools that get good examination results, have strong parental support and are threatened by closure only because of party political manoeuvring by county councillors and inexplicable hostility by local education authority officials?

Mr. Baker: Those are factors that I have to bear in mind when I am considering these matters. We have already made it clear, in the various guidelines that we have given, that one should not be too hasty in closing down schools of proven worth, as has happened in the past.

Mr. Straw: The Secretary of State must be aware that he is placing local education authorities in an impossible position. On the one hand, he has been putting them under pressure to close surplus places. On the other hand, any school now faced with closure can decide, understandably, to seek to opt out. What undertakings will the Secretary of State give to enable local education authorities, whether Conservative or Labour, to implement his policy of orderly school closures? What undertakings will he give to ensure that in capital spending, as in current, there will be no favourable treatment, no bribery of schools to entice them to opt out?

Mr. Baker: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman now shifts his grounds of criticism of grant-maintained status. As the Education Reform Act was going through its stages in the House, his argument was that few schools would opt for this status, although we said that many schools would be attracted by it. It was also said that very few parents would vote. The hon. Gentleman should look at the first two ballots. He has repeatedly raised the question of capital, and I want to make it clear that we are not offering financial advantages to grant-maintained schools. We shall have to consider the capital needs of such schools as they apply, and grant-maintained schools will receive current funding on the same basis as other schools in the authority.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, to opt out, a school will need to demonstrate strong parental support and good leadership from governors and from the head of staff—all factors that can only benefit pupils? Therefore, is it not a fact that the more schools that opt out, the better it will be for our children?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend is right. This option is now available and requires the considerable commitment of parents and governors, but that is in the full strain of our education policy. We are passing more responsibility down the line to individual schools and governors. We are also increasing competition in the education system. That is good for quality.

School Closures

11. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will review the procedures for school closures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: No, Sir.

Ms. Primarolo: Will the Minister explain how he will maintain his impartiality under section 12, regarding the possibility of school closures, while, at the same time, encouraging those same schools to opt out?

Mr. Butcher: I think that the hon. Lady is referring to the fact that applications have been suspended until 30 November. If the schools are eligible for grant-maintained status, that will allow them sufficient time to decide whether to apply.

The question of the criteria and attitude towards school closures has not changed. The procedures are well known. Unfortunately, the local education authority in the hon. Lady's constituency has had a chequered career, to put it mildly, in the way that it has presented its proposals, but she knows the factors in which we shall be interested if the authority puts forward alternative proposals.

Mr. Dickens: Does my hon. Friend agree that school closures and opting out are consistent with Conservative party policy to give parents power? Are we not the party that gave trade union members their power and council tenants their power?

Mr. Butcher: The answers to my hon. Friend's questions are yes, Sir, yes and yes.

Ms. Armstrong: As the Government are making it virtually impossible for local authorities to make closure proposals and, therefore, there are many surplus places throughout the country with which the Government are not assisting local authorities, will the Minister alter the procedures by which capital moneys for local authorities are calculated so that those schools under the authority of the local education department will have the opportunity to compete fairly with those schools which the Secretary of State is funding separately?

Mr. Butcher: The hon. Lady has missed the whole point of the Education Reform Act, which is to provide parents and governing bodies with more power by encouraging their schools to be filled according to parental choice. In due course that will have an effect on the capital allocation and maintenance programmes for those schools.

School Governors

12. Mr. Haselhurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the full quota of school governors under the statutory arrangements has been obtained; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information available so far from local authorities suggests that most schools are successfully filling all the places on their governing bodies.

Mr. Haselhurst: Does my hon. Friend agree that this is a gratifying response in the first year in which extended opportunities for gubernatorial positions have been available? In view of the importance of forging closer links between school and industry, is she satisfied from the returns so far that a goodly proportion of people with business experience are taking up those positions?

Mrs. Rumbold: Yes. We are extremely satisfied with the response that we have received from parents in the election of parent-governors. In those authorities where they have managed fully to constitute their governing bodies, we are also delighted to see that there has been fair representation from business and industry. When I visited my hon. Friend's county of Essex yesterday, I found that the county has been particularly successful in that venture.

Mr. Cryer: Will the Minister make sure that there are no deterrents to people becoming school governors, such as the establishment of a CTC, as has happened in Bradford, where the establishment of a CTC may well threaten the existence of secondary schools? If that is the case, as seems likely, people will not be enthusiastic to become governors and it will be yet another blow against the state sector, as was the establishment of CTCs in the first place.

Mrs. Rumbold: There is no need for the hon. Gentleman to worry. There is a need for new schools in Bradford, and the governing bodies will be constituted by the normal procedures of electing both parents and business men. He can be assured that in Bradford of all places a CTC will be welcomed by the community and needed by the pupils.

Teacher Training

13. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what action he intends to take to improve the quality of teacher training and to make it more relevant to the needs of modern industry.

Mr. Butcher: The Government already have in place a number of measures designed to improve teacher training and to give due importance to business and economic factors, in particular the tough new criteria for pre-service training courses introduced in 1984 and the comprehensive in-service training grant scheme introduced in 1987. My Department, the Department of Trade and Industry and the Training Agency are currently collaborating on a range of specific projects in this area.

Mr. Pawsey: I thank my hon. Friend for that comprehensive reply. Does he agree that many of our excellent education reforms will be undermined if teachers are not adequately trained? Does he accept that we should take a hard look at some teacher training colleges to ensure that the courses that they offer and the methods that they use will properly equip our children for society? Finally, does my hon. Friend agree that perhaps teacher training colleges should be next on our agenda for reform?

Mr. Butcher: Teacher training is the issue of the moment. It is our view that we should focus on quality, relevance and practicality of training. We do not want the colleges to become playgrounds for behavioural scientists, and thankfully, the majority of them are not. This is a serious question that must be addressed as a matter of great priority.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Sir Hugh Rossi: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 November.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. I was present at Victoria station to mark the arrival of the President of Senegal. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Sir Hugh Rossi: Did my right hon. Friend have the opportunity of observing the enormous damage to the environment during her most successful visit to Poland, on which my right hon. and hon. Friends would wish warmly to congratulate her? Is she aware that during her absence the United Nations published a survey of tree damage in 22 European countries, among which Great Britain appears to be one of the greatest sufferers? In the light of this new and alarming evidence, will she accelerate the Government's response to the latest report of the Select Committee on the Environment on air pollution, which has been outstanding for about six months?

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend for his supplementary question. I did not observe tree damage in Poland although I saw a number of chemical factories in the distance and became aware of the problems that Poland is having. I know of the report to which he has referred. We should like to see the entire report, because we think that the summary does not tell the whole story. I am aware of the work that my hon. Friend undertakes as the Chairman of the Select Committee on the Environment, and I shall make further inquiries to ascertain when we can expect to have the reply ready. I shall do my level best to accelerate the process. I am well aware of the important work that is carried out by the Committee. Similarly, my hon. Friend will be aware of the £1 billion programme on which we are embarking to try to reduce acid rain, to which our coal-fired power stations contribute. It is unfortunate that our coal contains a large amount of sulphur, and it is expensive to get rid of it.

Mr. Kinnock: Does the Prime Minister agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer that only a minority of pensioners have difficulty in making ends meet?

The Prime Minister: Pensioners' incomes have increased enormously during the lifetime of the Government. Every pensioner has a basic pension, and most have a second pension. Those who do not have a second pension have income support. The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that the increases in income support were announced last week.

Mr. Kinnock: The House and the country will note the Prime Minister's refusal to answer my question about the Chancellor. Can she tell us whether her refusal is because she agrees with the Chancellor, or because she disagrees with him?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman obviously tries to ask very selective questions and thus to avoid discussing the enormous improvement in the incomes of pensioners during the lifetime of this Government, and the fact that Britain's spending on the elderly is the third highest in Europe as a proportion of gross domestic product. Pensioners now have more security in their basic pensions, and in the increases in those pensions than they ever had under the tricks of the Labour party.

Mr. Kinnock: Does the Prime Minister agree with the Chancellor that only a small minority of pensioners have difficulty in making ends meet, or is she as ashamed of him as she should be?

The Prime Minister: If it had not been for the excellent stewardship—[HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] I shall answer questions in my own way. If it had not been for the excellent stewardship of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, we should not now have the highest standard of social services, including pensions, that this country has ever known; nor should we have been able to make up some of the shortfalls in pensions for which the Labour Government were responsible.

Rev. Ian Paisley: In view of the agreement entered into——

Mr. Faulds: The anti-Christ.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Rev. Ian Paisley: I am glad that my message has got across.

In view of the agreement entered into in Dublin yesterday by the Foreign Secretary about the standing of the territorial waters between Great Britain and the Irish Republic, what is now the standing of the territorial waters around Northern Ireland and Rockall? Dublin made it clear last night that those waters were not covered by the agreement. Can the Prime Minister affirm that her Government reject the Dublin claim over those territorial waters and that she will maintain and defend them as British waters?

The Prime Minister: The position on the territorial waters is the same as it was before the hon. Gentleman asked his question. I am aware of no change.

Mr. Ashdown: Is the Prime Minister aware that a decision is expected imminently from the Government on the future of North East Shipbuilders Ltd. on Wearside? In view of her welcome support for the unions at the Lenin shipyard in Gdansk, will she now take her fur hat to Wearside and express an equivalent solidarity with the workers, the unions and the community there?

The Prime Minister: An announcement will be made about the shipyard in Sunderland when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster is ready. He is not yet ready, or he would have made such an announcement. Let me point out that Solidarity is a great deal more than a trade union. As a matter of fact it is not recognised as a legal trade union—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Prime Minister must be given an opportunity to reply.

The Prime Minister: It is not recognised as a legal trade union, and obviously it would wish to be.

Solidarity is the only expression of opposition to Communism and Socialism in Poland. Solidarity wishes to have a plural society of the kind that we have, and is very much against the kind of Communism expressed by some people in this country. The hon. Gentleman will be delighted to know that its members did not raise with me in any way the position of the shipyard. They are more concerned to have a plural society and to get their trade union legally recognised.

Q2. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Nicholson: As today is the first anniversary of the Enniskillen bombing, as we approach Remembrance Sunday, and as we recall that Private Jason Winter from my constituency was one of those killed in the recent coach bombing, will my right hon. Friend pledge that she and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland will continue their excellent work in explaining to the American people and the new Administration what our forces are trying to achieve in Northern Ireland?

The Prime Minister: The House expressed its sympathy at the time that those brave people were killed in that terrible, atrocious incident. Yes, I will gladly take up my hon. Friend's invitation to try to do my best once again to explain to the people of the United States that our forces are in Northern Ireland as an aid to the civil power, to see that the rule of law is upheld, that the terrorist does not win, and that the terrorists cannot achieve by bombing and bullet what they cannot achieve by the ballot. It would be terrible if they were able to do that and, if the forces were not there, it would mean that the terrorists had won.

Q3. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Sheerman: Is the Prime Minister aware that in this country life expectancy at 65 is now significantly below 21 other comparable countries, including Cuba, Uruguay and Sri Lanka? Does she think that the widespread poverty of a third of our pensioners has anything to do with that? After 10 years, when will her Government do something about it?

The Prime Minister: I saw the report to which I think the hon. Gentleman is referring. It is not life expectancy at birth. I think that if he looks into the question of life expectancy at the age of 65, and takes into account life expectancy at birth, he will find a very much better result for this country.

Mr. Alexander: Has my right hon. Friend had time to read the report of the private notice question yesterday to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and especially the contribution from the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field)? Is it not clear from those exchanges that the Opposition are far less interested in getting extra benefits for those who need them than in making—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Not again. The hon. Gentleman must ask questions for which the Prime Minister has responsibility.

Q4. Mr. Janner: To ask the Prime Minister is she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. and learned Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Janner: Does the Prime Minister agree that the statement made yesterday by the Minister of State, Department of Health—that there is no point in further negotiations with the nurses because that would be a continuation of the lobster quadrille—is offensive and disgraceful? Does she not see that the porpoise right behind her and treading on her tail is the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has this week led the Government, her, the country and the pensioners a merry dance?

The Prime Minister: It was because of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer's excellent running of the economy that the nurses were able to have an increase in pay which cost the taxpayer—not the Exchequer—£928 million extra and which gave the nurses an increase in pay in real terms of 45 per cent. more than they had had under a Labour Government.

Q5. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official enagements for Tuesday 8 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Thurnham: Will my right hon. Friend welcome the overwhelming vote by the parents of children at St. James' church school in south-east Bolton to opt out of local authority control? Does that not prove that this Government offer the radical policies that the great majority of the people in this country want?

The Prime Minister: Yes. I saw the report in the press this morning of the overwhelming vote by the parents of St. James' school. I think that it is quite clear that most of the parents in this country welcome the extra choice that they have had under my right hon. Friend's policies and wish to be much more involved in their children's education. My hon. Friend is aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will make the final determination on this matter.

Mr. Litherland: How does the Prime Minister summon up the appalling gall to go to Poland to preach freedom and democracy when she is doing exactly the reverse in this country.

The Prime Minister: What absolute nonsense—utter and complete nonsense. What the Opposition cannot stand is that I had such a very warm welcome is all parts of Poland.

BILLS PRESENTED

Cold Climate Allowance

Mrs. Margaret Ewing, supported by Dr. Dafydd Elis Thomas, Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones, Mr. Alex Salmond, Mr. Andrew Welsh, Mr. Dafydd Wigley, Mr. James Molyneaux and Mr. Seamus Mallon presented a Bill to provide for more equitable heating allowances to reflect the increased costs of domestic heating in colder climates; and for purpose connected therewith: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 229.]

Medical Act 1983 (Amendment)

Mr. Nigel Spearing, supported by Sir Anthony Grant and Mr. Sam Galbraith presented a Bill to amend section 36 of the Medical Act 1983 to enable the Professional Conduct Committee of the General Medical Council to exercise greater discretion in respect of conduct which they judge cannot be regarded as acceptable professional conduct: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 18 November and to be printed. [Bill 231.]

Health and Medicines Bill

3.31 pm

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will be aware that in the House of Commons last week the clause in the Health and Medicines Bill relating to eye tests was carried by a small majority and that that Bill has now gone to the other place. There has been some suggestion that, because of the finances involved in relation to payment for eye tests, the Bill cannot be considered and fully reviewed by the other place in the normal way.

Can you, Mr. Speaker, state categorically that when the Bill first went from this House to the other place it was designated by you as not being a money Bill, and therefore the other place is fully entitled to reject the decision of the House of Commons should it desire to do so? Is it not also correct that it would be possible for the Bill to pass between the two Houses many times? I believe that, for example, what is now the Aircraft and Shipbuilding Industries Act 1977 passed between the Houses no fewer than eight times. Is it not the case that the other place has complete freedom to reject the decision taken last Tuesday in this House?

Mr. Speaker: I did not certify it as a money Bill, but, as the hon. Gentleman knows, during the debate I made a statement about the status of the amendments.

Chancellor of the Exchequer (Statement)

3.33 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will be aware that, although the Standing Orders of the House do not refer to Press Gallery or Lobby correspondents, their access to these premises and their behaviour are subject to rules administered by the Sergeant at Arms on your behalf. Those rules are laid down with the intention of protecting the interests of right hon. and hon. Members.

The breach of those rules could lead to the withdrawal of a Lobby or Press Gallery pass, or even action for breach of privilege. Clearly, false, malicious, or wholly inaccurate reporting of events or breaches of confidence are the main wrongs that those rules are intended to prevent. The system of accreditation that has been established through the Serjeant at Arms is intended to provide us all with such protection.

The issue of passes, particularly Lobby passes, gives certain privileges in terms of access to the premises. It also opens up the possibility for accredited Lobby correspondents to be invited by Ministers or others to Lobby briefings. Clearly, any misbehaviour by journalists under the aegis of their Lobby passes could cast doubt on their suitability for accreditation by the Serjeant at Arms.

We understand that last Friday a number of Sunday newspaper Lobby correspondents were invited for an off-the-record briefing by the Chancellor. Without exception, those Lobby correspondents said one particular thing——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is it a matter for me?

Mr. Dobson: I think that it is, Mr. Speaker.

The Lobby correspondents said that the Chancellor was contemplating the idea of means-testing a number of benefits presently universally available to pensioners. Yesterday, in the House, the Chancellor described their articles as a "farrago of invention" and said that the stories bore no relation to what he had said. Clearly that is a very serious charge——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman seems to have a lot of notes. What is the point of order for me?

Mr. Dobson: I also have yesterday's Hansard—these are not all my notes. The fact is that what the Chancellor said in the House yesterday was a serious charge against 10 journalists, which could prejudice their access to the Lobby and to the Press Gallery.

We should normally expect that an off-the-record meeting was literally off the record, but we now understand that, at public expense, it was tape-recorded. In view of the discrepancy between what the Chancellor told the House and what the journalists said that he said, I ask you to look into the matter, to listen to the tape and to clear the matter up one way or the other. It is clear that there are only two choices—either the journalists are unfit to report us from the Gallery, or the Chancellor is unfit to remain in No. 11 Downing street.

Mr. Speaker: I am responsible for order in the Chamber. I cannot be held responsible for off-the-record briefings held outside this building. No complaint has been made to me by the Lobby.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not a fact that if an hon. Member calls another hon. Member a liar, that hon. Member must retract? Further, is it not also a fact that you have ruled on several occasions that the Floor of the House should not be used as a cloak of privilege, in such a way as to enable persons who have no right to reply to be insulted, called liars, cheats, thieves or whatever? Surely it must be a matter for you, Mr. Speaker, when the Floor of the Chamber is used by a senior member of Her Majesty's Government to call 10 persons liars—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have never ruled that there can be any rationing of freedom of speech in this place. Either one has freedom of speech, or one does not. I have always warned that hon. Members must use their privilege of freedom of speech with due discretion.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As you will no doubt recall, although you were not in the House, 25 years ago a Minister resigned because he admitted that he had not told the truth. Yesterday the Chancellor said in the House, about the reports of the meeting:

> "Oh yes, they will have their shorthand notes and they will know it, and they will know they went behind afterwards and they thought there was not a good enough story and so they produced that."—[Official Report, 7 November 1988; Vol. 140, c. 26.]

I should like to draw your attention to the fact that Mr. Robert Harris, the political editor of The Observer, is quoted today in The Times as challenging the Treasury to publicise what had been said at that meeting. Mr. Robert Harris is quoted as saying——

Mr. Speaker: Order. What in all this is the point of order for me? There is no point of order. I am not responsible for what Mr. Robert Harris says. He is not a Member of the House.

Mr. Winnick: Mr. Harris said:

"It is unfair of the Chancellor to blame distorted reporting . . . Ten people got exactly the same impression from the briefing."

I should like to ask a simple question: if the Chancellor did not tell the truth, and if the journalists are telling the truth——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall not adjudicate on such matters. Every hon. Member must be responsible for what he says in the House.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. As you will know, under the House of Commons (Administration) Act 1978 you have some responsibility for members of the Press Gallery. To that extent you have a degree of responsibility—albeit not a very happy one—to intervene in this matter. May I make a few suggestions?

Mr. Speaker: As between chairmen, yes.

Mr. Skinner: I shall speak as one chairman to another. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, you might be able to call the teenage scribblers together and provide us with a list of those who were present at the meeting. You would then be able to inform us, in a briefing capacity, of what took place, and the chances are that we should take your word for it. Finally, will you ensure that you do not take the Chancellor's tape recorder with you?

Mr. Speaker: I shall now take another point of order.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since the Press Gallery is well-renowned for partisanship and frequent misrepresentation of what actually takes place in Parliament, since it is so easily bought in political terms, and since some of us have the sense to have very little to do with it, would it not be better to clear out the whole damned lot?

Mr. Speaker: I shall take one more point of order.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Chancellor of the Exchequer confirmed yesterday that a briefing took place, and my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) has now revealed that there is a tape recording of it. Would it be in order for us to ask for the tape recording to be put into the Library, as it is a public tape recording, paid for at Treasury expense? May we ask for it to be put in the Library so that all hon. Members can hear what was said at the briefing? If that is not done, the whole episode will become known as Lawsongate.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall deal with one point of order at a time.

I am not responsible for having tape recordings put in the Library. As the House knows, I cannot be responsible for off-the-record briefings.

Mr. Dobson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you advise the House whether you are prepared to entertain a motion to exclude the 10 Lobby journalists from the Press Gallery? I should not want to support such a motion, but those who are convinced of the Chancellor's accuracy yesterday would, no doubt, happily vote for it. That would at least give those journalists the opportunity to defend their reputations in public, where they are entitled to defend them.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have an important debate ahead of us.

Mr. Dickens: I shall not take long, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I ask the hon. Gentleman to sit down. Surely the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) does not seriously suggest that I should table such a motion. If he wishes to do so, he may.

Mr. Dickens: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it right that you should be put to the test of giving rulings on so many bogus points of order raised by Opposition Members? The Opposition are clearly unhappy that we shall not take away the pensioners' Christmas bonus and that we shall not take money off the pensioners. In fact, they are unhappy that we shall help pensioners more. They cannot beat us in that way, so why do they spend so much time on bogus points of order, which are raised for political purposes?

Mr. Speaker: I shall take one more point of order.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it not a rule of the House that if a Minister refers to a document and quotes from it he has to provide it for the House at a later stage? Is it not the case that the Chancellor referred yesterday to a report in the Treasury Office, and is it not now his duty under that rule to lay the document before the House?

Mr. Speaker: That would be absolutely right had the Chancellor been quoting from a state paper, but I do not think that an off-the-record briefing could be regarded as a state paper.

Mr. Harry Ewing: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I said that the point of order raised by the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) would be the last one that I would take. This is positively the last one.

Mr. Ewing: My point of order is in the same helpful vein as that raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). Ten days ago, Mr. Speaker, you were rightly very angry with me because I had a copy of the Chancellor's speech and read it a line ahead of the Chancellor. Since then I have lost half a stone in weight getting up and down trying to catch your eye—without any success until today.

On reflection, do you agree that it would be far better if the Chancellor gave me a copy of every speech that he is to make, because when I read his speech he was accurately reported the following day? If I read everything that the Chancellor intended to say a line ahead of him, even the Daily Express would report it accurately.

Mr. Speaker: That was a very good try.

British Rail

3.45 pm

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide for the privatisation of British Rail.

When I tabled the Bill in July, I little imagined that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport would make such a robust speech about privatisation at the Conservative party conference. What I seek to do today is to persuade the Government of the best option —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will hon. Members who are not staying for the ten-minute Bill please leave quietly?

Mr. Bennett: British Rail management has much improved some of its activities under the leadership of Bob Reid, but British Rail is still a producer-led monopoly which, all too often, puts the interests of its staff before those of its customers. It is appropriate that the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) is to oppose the Bill as the hon. Gentleman is sponsored by the largest producer union—the National Union of Railwaymen. I seek to speak on behalf of a much larger group—the rail passengers.

British Rail is still conservative and unimaginative. Its marketing is still half-baked. Staff are often slovenly and lack pride in their job and even in their appearance. The catering services are never available when the passenger wants them. Cancellations, delays, dirty stock and overcrowding are still prevalent.

Across the world, Governments are turning to the private sector to help them to operate their railway systems. The biggest example to date is Japan, which privatised its railways last year. The United States has private railways, although its problems of size often give the airlines a competitive edge. In South America, Chile, Brazil and Argentina are to privatise their railways. In the far east, Malaysia and Thailand are to privatise. In Europe, Finland is splitting its train budget into two so that the cost of track is separated from operating costs, and the West German Government are questioning the cost of their railway system.

In the short term, we could privatise station and carriage cleaning, maintenance, train catering, security, portering and other services that could easily be hived off from the main railway operation. We could also set in train a number of experiments. At least three major towns in the United Kingdom are served by lines from two different main line stations in London. Exeter is served by Waterloo and Paddington; Birmingham, by Paddington and Euston; and Cambridge, by Liverpool street and King's Cross. It would be perfectly proper and feasible for different operators to operate services to those three towns. My hon. Friend the Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Field) has already suggested that the service in the Isle of Wight could be hived off to a private operator with no connection with the British Rail system.

In the longer term, privatisation must be predicated on three principles. First, safety must be the paramount concern. Secondly, there must be an improvement for passengers. Thirdly, there must be continued support for rural and social services. I do not believe that British Rail's preferred option is the right one. British Rail proposes to privatise as a private monopoly. Bearing in mind our experience with British Gas, I do not believe that the customer would want that to happen.

The general principle of privatisation would release British Rail and the railway system from the Treasury-controlled external financing limit. British Rail could then go into the market and seek investment for its own schemes without the concern of the Government. So there are serious competitors ranged against the No. 1 option. We must make sure that British Rail's competition is internal as well as external. I do not accept the board's argument that competition with buses and airlines is enough. We must have internal competition so that British Rail's costs are brought under control and the organisation is made accountable to the passengers.

I therefore propose that a rail authority should be established to ensure conditions of safety and fair play. Below that would be five or six regional infrastructure companies with responsibility for stations, signals and track. These companies should be allowed to run trains so that we can see the competitive costs of different train operations. In addition, there should be a third tier under which operating companies would have a statutory right to operate trains in time slots, which could be allotted. In a minor way, that system exists already. The Orient Express operates on British Rail track; Foster Yeoman operates its own class 59 locomotives and wagons on British Rail track. Productivity levels of those outfits are far higher than those of British Rail's freight operation. Fourteen thousand five hundred freight wagons are already in use.

Safety should be the main responsibility of the regulatory rail authority. The benefits of competition derived from a variety of operators and types of service will be useful to passengers. The railway unions' arguments are so facile that they should be knocked down now. First, they say that trains cannot overtake, but of course they do. Many train timetable systems are organised in flights to maximise capacity. British Rail speeds vary between 35 milies an hour for freight pick-up to 125 miles an hour on Intercity, and fast and slow trains run on the same track with overtaking loops, fast tracks through stations and two-track signal lines by directional working. So, already, the possibility exists of running trains with different operators at different speeds. With timetable computerisation and inter-regional working provided through an attractive financial package, competition will be maximised by market forces.

What about breakdowns? At the moment, there is no redress from British Rail if a train breaks down. Passengers grin and bear it. Commercial operators have some form of redress in the form of financial claims against the railway system. The third tier option with different operators will ensure that the service is better by providing for financial penalties against operators who do not run their trains efficiently.

Finally, I turn to rural and social routes. We need proper costing of wear on tracks. We must abolish the public service obligation grants and replace them with line service grants with central and local government input. That is what we have done with the bus system—subsidised the service, not the system. Let us ensure that public money goes to the services that the public judge to be in need of social subsidy.

My Bill seeks to place the passengers first and to give them a service comparable with that of Marks and Spencer or Sainsbury, rather than the sort of service that they have had to endure for the past 40 years.

3.53 pm

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. Gentleman seeking to oppose the Bill?

Mr. Snape: Yes, Sir.

As a member of the National Union of Railwaymen I may say that I have never heard so much claptrap in all my life. So much of the case for rail privatisation has a quaint, antiquated, back-to-the-future quality about it.

The hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) propounded a track authority approach to privatisation, a line of argument usually associated with the Adam Smith Institute. There is a name to conjure with—that of a man who was born in 1723 and died in 1790, before railways were even invented. How did he manage to pass on these gems to the hon. Member for Pembroke?

The Centre for Policy Studies, a group of Right-wing teenage ideologues, has issued its report on privatisation, "Reviving the Railways", subtitled "A Victorian Future", which is a fantasy of recreating not only the four pre-1947 companies but of going further back into the past to pre-1923, when there were almost 150 railway companies. We have been there before. It did not work then, and will not work now. What is the great and glorious past to which the hon. Gentleman and his right hon. and hon. Friends wish to return? In the 10 years before the second world war, three of the four private railway companies never paid a dividend of more than 1 per cent. on ordinary shares. Even the Great Western Railway rarely paid a dividend of more than 3 per cent.

Mr. Bennett: What does that have to do with it?

Mr. Snape: If the hon. Gentleman will shut up, I shall tell him.

Under the present Government, Intercity services are supposed to bring a return of 2·7 per cent.—hardly the kind of figure to attract those lager-swilling yuppies from the City about whom we read so much. The returns of the 1920s and 1930s are also fairly pathetic when compared with the results now sought by the City of London.

As to the so-called golden age of efficiency and competition in the 1920s and 1930s, when the free market gave us service with a smile, it is interesting to draw comparisons with one or two modern routes. In 1938, there were 26 trains a day between Bournemouth and London. There are currently 64. In 1938, the fastest journey time on that route was 116 minutes. Today it is 96 minutes.

It is true that in 1938 there were two competing railway companies on the London to Birmingham route, when there were 22 trains running daily. Some left from Euston and others from Paddington. However, they did not operate on a fixed frequency. If one missed the train from Euston, one also missed the train from Paddington. That was because, at least in theory, they were competing against each other. Today, 33 trains run daily between London and Birmingham. In 1938, the fastest journey time was 1 hour 55 minutes, whereas today, not counting the Pullman, it is 1 hour 32 minutes. That is a significant improvement.

If one considers the hon. Gentleman's own constituency of Pembroke, it is difficult to imagine too many City whizzkids being anxious to run a service to that far-flung outpost. Had the hon. Gentleman propounded his childish and infantile ideas in his own constituency on a Sunday in 1938, it would have taken him 9 hours 22 minutes to return to London—some might think, a good thing too. In 1988, he can be back in London boring the rest of us in only 6 hours 19 minutes. That is not bad for a nationalised railway in 50 years. The truth is that the golden age of railways never existed—particularly in the 1930s.

No one should be in any doubt about the positive achievements of the publicly owned rail system—[Interruption.] I hope that the hon. Member for Pembroke, having made his own case, will have the courtesy to listen to my reply. He did not make his case very well, and I am trying to speak slowly because I know that the hon. Gentleman cannot think very quickly.

Today, the railway carries more passengers than at any time in the 1920s, when private car ownership became a reality. Today's railway system carries its passengers faster and—provided one can get a seat, which is not always possible—at a higher standard of comfort than ever before. Also, it costs the Exchequer far less than it costs the Governments of any of our European neighbours to run their passenger rail services.

It is significant that, after 10 years of Conservative Government and of being told by them how well British Rail management is running its services, we are now informed by the hon. Member for Pembroke that those services are dirty and unpunctual. Some of them are, and I myself have been known to complain about them. However, there is nothing wrong with British Rail that proper funding would not put right; anybody who cares about the future of our national rail system knows that to be so.

The track authority concept to which the hon. Gentleman referred is also, in railway terms, a non-starter. There are, I suppose, some rather lucrative pieces of real estate around British Rail stations and tracks. The track authority would rent out space for competing services run by private operating companies. Anyone with a shred of knowledge about operating practices would know just how impracticable is that idea.

If there is an up line and a down line between two cities, and a train full of proles run by one company comes to a standstill on the up line, it is no use the champagne swiggers on the Orient Express behind trying to overtake—it is not possible on a two-track railway. Unlike bus deregulation, one cannot cut short the route, jump the traffic lights, or miss out passengers standing at a bus stop in order to beat one's competitors. Fortunately, there are safety standards which guarantee that few railway passengers lose their lives in the course of a year compared with the 5,000 or so people who are killed on Britain's roads.

The hon. Gentleman has palpably failed to prove his case. He has, predictably for him, not listened to the alternative because he is too busy involved in conversation with his hon. Friends. One would have thought that such a passionate advocate of the free market had come from nowhere to the top of a major publicly quoted company; that he started as the office boy and ended up as the chairman. As a matter of fact, according to "Who's Who", before he came here the hon. Gentleman was a school-teacher, after which he became a full-time bureaucrat—I hesitate to use that word, although that is the sort of language that Conservative Members use—with the Inner London education authority in one of the London boroughs. Far from exposing himself to an icy bath full of private enterprise water, he has had rather a comfortable existence in the municipal sector.

I have some advice for the hon. Gentleman as a result of listening to him this afternoon. I shall buy him a junior engine spotter's notebook so that he can discover something about the railway system by travelling around a bit. When he comes back and gets a bit bigger I shall even get him a ride on an engine, providing that he can prove that he has learnt something about the railway system.

The trouble with those infants on the Conservative Benches is that they know nothing and care even less about the passengers or those who work within the railway industry. Those Conservative Members who do—I know that there are some—should join me and my hon. Friends in voting against this silly and childish motion this afternoon.

Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland)

4.12 pm

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Before the debate begins, can I seek your guidance on a matter of deep concern to many hon. Members on both sides of the House? You, Mr. Speaker, will have studied the draft order before us, and you will agree that it is a document of very great importance and of the most far-reaching significance for the administration of justice in the Province. Yet the Government have chosen to introduce that important piece of legislation not by means of a Bill, but by means of an Order in Council, which is unamendable.

It is enormously difficult for hon. Members who take an interest in the administration of justice in the Province to debate a proposed change of legislation without the possibility of the proposed legislation being considered in Committee and on Report. We are grateful to my right hon. Friend for having allowed a long time for us to debate the order, but that is no substitute for being able to move amendments and for those amendments being considered by the Minister in charge of the Bill. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether there is any reason why the Government could not have proceeded with the legislation by the conventional Bill procedure, although it is correct that the order applies only to Northern Ireland.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know that it is for me to say whether other methods might have been used. My concern in studying the Order Paper is to ensure that what is on it is in order. This procedure is in order. I often hear such complaints during debates on Northern Ireland orders, and I think that the hon. Gentleman should make his point during the debate.

4.14 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): I beg to move,

That the draft Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 20 October 1988, be approved.

I entirely understand why my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) raised that point of order. The House knows that it is in order to introduce an order in this form, because the provisions apply to the general criminal law in Northern Ireland and that is a reserved matter as defined in schedule 3 to the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973. In the absence of any proposals for devolution, provision can be made by Order in Council subject to affirmative resolution of both Houses of Parliament. I am conscious of the reservations of many right hon. and hon. Members about that procedure, and I certainly would be willing to sit down with them and discuss the ways in which we proceed with legislation, and particularly to discuss with the elected representatives of Northern Ireland, and other parties in the House, whether there are ways in which procedure might be improved.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. King: No. I have sought to respond honourably to the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), and I should get on.

In view of some of the reporting of this issue I must make it clear straight away that the purpose of the draft order is not in any way to remove the so-called right of silence of suspects questioned by the police or of defendants in court. Nothing in the draft order will oblige an accused to make a statement, nor is there any suggestion that silence should be an offence. As I shall explain, the purpose of this draft order is to allow the courts in certain carefully defined circumstances to draw such inferences as would be proper from an accused's silence.

Mr. Budgen: Before my right hon. Friend goes into detail, will he please tell the House whether any disadvantage would be suffered if he were to adopt the Bill procedure for this measure?

Mr. King: This procedure has been followed in the past for matters affecting the general criminal law. I sought to respond as positively as I could to the reservations expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne. I have nothing to add to my comments.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. King: If the right hon. Gentleman will allow me, I sought to respond to a point of order that was not for the Chair, and I hoped that the House would find my comments helpful. Although my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne was generous enough to say that we have some time, we do not have limitless time and I should like to make some progress.

For some time the Government have been reviewing the law on criminal evidence in Northern Ireland in the light of the grave challenge from continuing terrorist violence and from other serious crime, particularly racketeering. They have had before them a formidable body of persuasive evidence for change, including the acknowledged difficulties faced by the police and the prosecuting authorities in bringing to justice hardened, professional criminals—often assisted by able legal advisers—who are thoroughly trained in resisting police questioning, and in the case of terrorists, who even publish in their news-sheets detailed instructions on techniques for resisting questioning under the heading, "Whatever you say, say nothing". That is a measure of the importance attached to silence by those who are engaged in a sustained and systematic assault on the rule of law and the institutions of our democracy. These practices are now widely recognised and imitated throughout the criminal elements in Northern Ireland.

At present the law in Northern Ireland—as in England and Wales—precludes a trial judge from suggesting to the jury that an adverse inference may be drawn from the fact that an accused chose to remain silent when questioned by the police, or in a Diplock court, where there is no jury, the effect is that the judge must direct himself that he may not draw inferences from the accused's silence. That is so, even if the circumstances were such that an innocent person might reasonably have been expected to proclaim his innocence and draw attention to facts which served to establish it. Whether that should be so has long been the subject of a debate which has sharply divided the legal profession.

The Government were impressed by the arguments and recommendations of the Criminal Law Revision Committee in its 11th report in 1972 that in certain carefully defined circumstances it should be permissible for a court to draw adverse inferences from an accused's silence during questioning. In many—though not all—cases it is surely reasonable to expect that an innocent man will wish to proclaim his innocence and to co-operate with the police by answering questions, and most laymen would regard a complete refusal to answer questions as suggestive of guilt.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South) rose——

Mr. King: I emphasise that in no sense would it even now, if the draft order is approved, become mandatory to draw any inference, but only if the court or a jury, properly directed by the trial judge, deemed it proper to do so.

Mr. John Morris (Aberavon): So that the House will understand what the procedure will be, will the right hon. Gentleman tell me the words of the caution that the police constable will now give?

Mr. King: I cannot give that advice. The draft has been prepared and is being considered. Clearly, it will be necessary for that to be approved and agreed. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman is aware, it will be in a form that will satisfy the courts.

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. King: It may be more helpful if I take one intervention at a time.

In the Government's view there is much force in the CLRC's argument that the present law hands an unnecessary advantage to the hardened criminal who uses it to refuse to answer any questions and thus to bring police investigations to a halt. I am aware that these issues have been much discussed, that the CLRC recommendations aroused some strong opposition and that recently the Royal Commission on criminal procedure, by a majority, rejected introducing measures to allow courts to draw inferences from silence.

However, the law on criminal evidence should not be artificial and surely it is desirable that all relevant evidence should be admitted—as the CLRC recognised. The object of a criminal trial is to establish the guilt or innocence of the accused. While the innocent should always be acquitted, it is also important that the guilty be convicted.

The Government believe, therefore, that the arguments against change are overstated and that the CLRC's arguments are stronger, full of common sense and significantly reinforced by the deliberate and extreme exploitation of the present position. If right hon. and hon. Members refresh their memories on the Royal Commission's analysis, they will see that it was based on a study showing that few people made use of the right to silence. About 4 per cent. refused to answer any questions. Anybody with any knowledge of Northern Ireland will know that in Northern Ireland the figure is very different.

In that context, the Government took note of the law in the Republic of Ireland, which was changed by the Irish Parliament in 1984 by the enactment of sections 18 and 19 of its Criminal Justice Act 1984, permitting the courts in the Republic to draw adverse inferences in certain specified circumstances from the fact that an accused had remained silent when questioned by the police.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): In the interests of accuracy, should not the Secretary of State point out the four areas in which the order differs from that which pertains in the Republic of Ireland?

Mr. King: I will spell out the details of the order and that will become apparent.

We have now reviewed a wide range of evidence and the Government propose, through the draft order, that the general criminal law in Northern Ireland should be amended to permit the courts in four circumstances to draw whatever inferences would be proper from the fact that an accused remained silent. Two are dealt with by provisions that have the same effect as two provisions recommended by the CLRC. The first is the "ambush", where, having remained silent during police questioning, the accused offers an explanation of his conduct for the first time at his trial when he might reasonably have been expected to offer it when being questioned.

The second provides that, if the prosecution can establish that there is a case to answer, the accused must be warned that he will be called to give evidence and that if he should refuse to do so, the court may draw such inferences as would appear proper.

The other two provisions have the same effect as sections 18 and 19 of the Irish Criminal Justice Act 1984. One allows the court to draw such inferences as would appear proper from an accused's failure or refusal to explain to the police certain specified facts such as substances or marks on his clothing. The other makes similar provision where an accused fails or refuses to account to the police for his presence at a particular place.

Before I explain the content of the articles in the draft order, it is worth remembering that the changes will operate against the background of the established protection for a suspect's rights in police custody in Northern Ireland and that we have in hand proposals further to enhance those rights. For those detained under the terrorism provisions, part II of the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1987 provides comprehensive protection for the rights of suspects while in police custody. Under those provisions a person has a right to have someone informed that he is being detained, where he is being held, and a statutory right to consult a solicitor. In both cases the police are obliged to inform the person of his rights. Similar provisions will be proposed for persons suspected of non-terrorist offences when the Government shortly lay before Parliament a draft police and criminal evidence order, for which a proposal has been out for consultation during recent months.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): Can the Secretary of State inform the House of the number of occasions when an application for a solicitor has been refused?

Mr. King: I need to check the details. I shall look into that and I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General will be anxious to reply.

Article 1 brings articles 2 and 4 into operation on the seventh day after the order is made. The remaining provisions of the order will come into operation on the expiration of one month from the day on which the order is made. The delay of one month is necessary to ensure that police instructions can be implemented on the need to warn suspects of the implications of their failure to explain material facts when questioned.

Mr. Duffy: Before those articles become operative, will the right hon. Gentleman assure the House that the automatic reporting of police interrogations will be universally available?

Mr. King: By "automatic reporting" does the hon. Gentleman mean tape recording?

Mr. Duffy: Yes.

Mr. King: The police and criminal evidence order, which is out for consultation, covers that and it is intended to introduce it, but not for terrorism cases. Hon. Members may smile, but anyone who has studied the issue knows that there is a real problem. The greatest evil is the evil of terrorism and the intimidation and threats that go with it, and people must be aware of the difficulties involved in interrogation and intelligence if we record such cases. I am certainly keen to see that, and it is intended to introduce it. It is in the order, which the hon. Gentleman may have studied.

Article 2 deals with the interpretation of expressions used in the order. I draw the special attention of the House to articles 2(4) and (5) because they make clear on the face of the draft order that no one can be convicted under any of these provisions solely on inferences drawn from his silence.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): The Secretary of State has drawn attention to the provision in article 2(4). That article says that in deciding whether there is a case to answer, a court shall not draw the inference set out in article 3. Article 3(2) says:

"Where this paragraph applies—

(a) the court, in determining whether to commit the accused . . . or whether there is a case to answer; may—

(i) draw such inferences".

On the face of it, are those two provisions not inconsistent?

Mr. King: On the face of it, I do not think that they are, but the right hon. and learned Gentleman is a lawyer and I do not want to tangle with him. Fortunately, I have brought some supporting arms in the shape of my right hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor-General. Later, perhaps he will be kind enough to engage in an interesting legal exercise. As I say, on first reading I do not think that the articles are inconsistent, but I have great respect for the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), bearing in mind his previous activities, and I shall look carefully at the point that he raises.

Article 3, which has the same effect as draft clause 1 of the Criminal Law Review Committee's recommendations, substantially abolishes the rule of evidence that, if the accused relies in his defence on some fact that he failed to mention when questioned or charged, the court or jury may not draw inferences from the failure and may not treat this failure as corroboration of the evidence against him. Article 4 has the same effect as draft clause 5.

Mr. Gow: Before my right hon. Friend leaves article 3, may I ask him if he is asking the House to approve this order after a debate of a maximum of four and a half hours, without telling the House the words that will be contained in the caution given to a suspect?

Mr. King: As I said before, a draft caution has been produced and is being considered by the Lord Chief Justice. Of course it will be necessary for the caution to comply with the terms of the order. If it does not comply with those terms—I bow to such advice as I might receive—my understanding is that it would not be a valid caution. It will be necessary for the court to be satisfied that the caution properly reflects the terms, conditions and circumstances faced by an accused under this order. That is my understanding of the matter.

As I said, article 4 has the same effect as draft clause 5. If, at the trial of the accused, the court considers that there is a case for him to answer, then, subject to certain exceptions, the court must at the appropriate time call on him to give evidence. If he refuses to do so or if he refuses without good cause to answer any question, the court or jury may draw such inferences from the refusal as appear proper, and may also treat such a refusal as corroboration of any evidence against the accused.

Mr. Bermingham rose——

Mr. King: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not give way. Interventions tend to break the thread of the argument.

Article 5 which has the same effect as section 18 of then Irish Criminal Justice Act 1984, provides that a court or jury may draw such inferences as appear proper where an accused fails to account to a constable for some specified fact such as a mark on his person or clothing or the condition of his clothing or footwear. There is a safeguard that such inferences can be drawn only if the accused was told in ordinary language by the arresting constable what the effect of failure or refusal might be.

Finally, article 6 has the same effect as section 19 of the Irish legislation. It makes similar provisions to the previous article about the inferences that may be drawn from a failure or refusal by an accused when arrested by a constable to account for his presence at a particular place at or about the time when the offence was committed.

The proposals in the order have been brought forward only after the most careful consideration by me, my Department and the Government of a subject that has been debated exhaustively over the last 16 years. In his statement on 20 October, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary made clear that he also intends at the earliest opportunity to bring forward legislation on this matter for England and Wales, but it is right that we should act now in Northern Ireland to restore the balance of justice there.

Anyone who knows anything about the present situation in Northern Ireland and about the challenge that is faced by the police and the prosecuting authorities whose very lives are at risk as they discharge their responsibilities to protect the community, will know about the deep sense of concern and frustration felt by all decent people in Northern Ireland. They are concerned and frustrated because they know that the absolute refusal by many people to answer questions cannot be taken into account by a court.

I was asked whether I have any figures. The RUC informs me that of all those detained for questioning in connection with serious crimes, including terrorist offences in Northern Ireland, just under half refuse to answer any substantive question while in police custody. Many of those people will not answer any questions. It is quite clear that in too many cases justice is being thwarted, and this must be remedied as soon as possible.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Is there any evidence to suggest—and this may well be the case—that those who refuse to answer questions are more likely to be aquitted than those who answer questions?

Mr. King: There is considerable evidence to show that justice is being thwarted. I do not think that it is any secret that many people about whom there are grave doubts and the gravest suspicions are not brought to justice. It is a matter of balance. In discharging my responsibilities I have to take into account the fact that the whole system of justice in Northern Ireland is under attack. I have here a list of magistrates and judges who have been injured or murdered. The list takes no account of the previous intimidation of juries or of the intimidation and murder of witnesses. That list is the most visible evidence of the attack on the system of justice in Northern Ireland and the holder of my office can neither remain ignorant of that attack nor disinterested in it.

We also know that there is a calculated campaign to frustrate the course of justice, not least through the advertised campaigns of instruction about how to frustrate police questioning. Earlier I mentioned the slogan, "Whatever you say, say nothing". That has permeated right through terrorist crime into racketeering, gang-type activities and general criminal activities. Faced with that, and with the need to maintain the balance of justice and the protections of which this House, of all places, is jealous, I would dare to presume, in front of a number of distinguished lawyers facing me, as well as those behind me, that one needs and is entitled, and the House has a duty, to keep that law under review and to see that the balance is correctly maintained in the face of this calculated and determined attack. I am standing here now because I believe that this is a time when that balance has to be redressed, and when we have to consider whether there is a case for making modest changes.

As I said at the start of my speech, in no sense is this an attack on the right to silence in the sense of people being compelled to speak. Under the serious fraud legislation, it can be a contempt if people refuse to give evidence, but there is no such requirement in this order. In four limited areas, we are proposing to move from the situation in which there is an absolute prohibition on a judge or jury drawing any conclusion from silence. I think that many people would think that we were mad if, in certain circumstances, when the law is deliberately exploited by a number of clearly guilty men who are among others who may face the courts, we were to say that there should be no opportunity for the courts to draw any inference.

This is a limited measure and I could be criticised for not going further. As I emphasised earlier, it will not be mandatory for the courts or for a jury as properly instructed by a judge to draw any inference. They will have, if they think it proper and if, in the case of a jury, they are properly directed by a judge, the opportunity to take this into account. The House owes it to the people who seek to maintain a system of justice against all the provocation, the dangers and the difficulties, at least to allow this modest change in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): I have listened with great care to my right hon. Friend. Perhaps he might bear in mind that there are no greater opponents of terrorism than I and my hon. Friends the Members for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) and for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow). All three of us are loyal supporters of the Union, but have a clear feeling of unease about the way in which, and the haste with which, the order has been brought into the House. In view of the perfectly sensible questions about, for example, the caution, is there not time for some reflection and further discussion about this matter before it is put to the vote?

Mr. King: I think it right to bring this order before the House tonight, and that is why I am standing here now. I sought earlier to cover some of the points that my hon. Friend made. This is not a new subject. My hon. Friend is familiar with Northern Ireland, and knows that this is a matter that anybody spending any time discussing the situation in Northern Ireland and visiting the Province will find raised as an issue on which there are strong feelings. Against that background, while I am under no illusions that this is some panacea for the problems of securing a better balance in convictions and in seeing that justice is done, I believe that these are sensible and necessary measures to take. They have struck the right balance between the proper interests of people facing charges in Northern Ireland——

Mr. Budgen: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. King: Will my hon. Friend allow me to finish?

They strike the right balance. They are modest but important changes. They are not changes that innocent people need fear, but they at last restore something to, and will help maintain, the balance of a system of justice that is under threat, to the benefit of all the people in the Province.

4.45 pm

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): These modest changes are only on a par with Dean Swift's modest proposals. It is not right to say that juries do not draw an inference from silence and by the accused not going into the witness box, whether the judge draws attention to it or not. Juries are not idiots and they draw inferences.

It is with a sense of sadness that I reply to the Secretary of State, because, despite all the warnings, despite all the evidence of the past 20 years, despite his own knowledge of the realities of the conflict in Northern Ireland, he has fallen into a pattern that we have witnessed all too often. A new Secretary of State approaches his office with hopes for the future and a commitment to reform. He becomes disappointed at the slow pace of progress and then resorts to simplistic and repressive solutions. The Secretary of State has failed to recognise that, to the extent that reform has failed, the main responsibility lies with the Government's half-hearted pursuit of that objective.

The Secretary of State appears to have abandoned the long-term strategy of the Anglo-Irish Agreement for a short term, short-sighted attempt to keep the lid on the conflict. Once again, the Province is suffering from the inability of its rulers to appreciate the complexities of its problems. This order epitomises the politics of despair, and despair is always dangerous, particularly in politics. It is, after all, the only sin that cannot be forgiven; that is why the Labour party opposes the measures, both for its simpleness and because it implements the politics of despair.

We oppose the order because it reveals the political bankruptcy of the Government and because it represents such a transformation of the legal system that no one who believes in the liberty of the citizen can support it. Hon. Members on both sides of the House will rightly point out that terrorism itself violates the rights of the individual. It does, but that is why the state must go out of its way to maintain civil liberties. The paramilitaries cannot be defeated through methods that are incompatible with the existence of democracy. Unless the state enjoys a moral status incomparably superior to that of its armed opponents, it cannot triumph. Otherwise, it relies on the argument that might is right, and that is the essence of the paramilitary case.

If there is no difference between the state and the paramilitaries in terms of means, one would have to choose whom to support on the basis of ends alone. It is self-evident that the legitimacy of the lawful authorities would be seriously undermined if that were the case. While the House is not neutral in the conflict, the unpalatable reality is that large sections of the population in Northern Ireland are neutral about the security forces and the paramilitaries of either community. These are the people who supported the institutions of Government, and their support must be won if the conflict is to end, but the order will reinforce those people in their distrust.

Mr. Marlow: The public perception is that the end that the Labour party supports is that of a united Ireland, and when the Government introduce means to frustrate terrorism, then the Opposition always seem to oppose them. The public is perfectly clear about what the Opposition are trying to do.

Mr. McNamara: To combat terrorism, we shall support any proper means under the rule of law which we believe would be effective. The problem is that the Government are continually introducing methods that are not effective, as I shall seek to demonstrate.

This is evident when one considers the logic behind this measure. The order stems from a state of mind in which the militarisation of the judicial process becomes a legitimate tactic. Such an approach neglects the damage inflicted on the credibility and effectiveness of that process. In that sense, the order is a victory for those it purports to undermine.

The order is fundamentally flawed because the Government assume that an extremely complex political problem can be resolved merely through changes in the legal system. They assume that the opposition to the present institutions in Northern Ireland and the alienation from democratic politics can be overcome merely by coercion. We do not accept that. The Government have issued the wrong prescription because they have falsely diagnosed the problem. They justify the order by the need to facilitate the work of the police and the courts when dealing with highly trained paramilitaries. The Labour party supports measures which, under the rule of law, effectively combat the paramilitary threat, but this order does not do so.

It is not the co-operation of the paramilitaries in an interrogation chamber which is significant, it is the fact that tens of thousands of ordinary citizens in Northern Ireland do not co-operate with the Royal Ulster Constabulary. That is the problem, and it cannot be changed by negative initiatives of this sort. It will change only when the institutions in Northern Ireland, including the Royal Ulster Constabulary, become more acceptable throughout the whole of Northern Ireland. Far from doing anything to inspire greater confidence in the police and the judiciary, the order will bring them into further disrepute. The Government, having abandoned the hope of winning consent, are resorting to coercion. That is a pattern all too obvious in the history of Britain's dealings with Ireland.

One of the major steps in the establishment of our civil liberties came in 1568 in the decision by the Court of Common Pleas to release a prisoner jailed for refusing to answer questions put to him by a trial judge. The threat to the security of the kingdom at that time was far more severe than anything we face today. Similarly, the 1640s —when the right to silence became fully established—was a period of great domestic and international upheaval, but it was precisely at those moments of stress and threat that the importance of civil liberty was recognised. The kingdom survived and grew in strength and authority because of the extension of rights and freedoms, not in spite of them.

Those historical lessons are now being thrown overboard by an arrogant Government who have lost faith in their ability to reconcile law with order.

Mr. Bermingham: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way so courteously, when the Secretary of State repeatedly failed to give way to me. Does my hon. Friend agree that this issue does not just concern the right to silence? This is the first step on the road to compelling people to give evidence in court on oath. That is the subtle difference. When a court calls upon a person to give evidence under article 5 in this charter, it calls upon a person to give evidence on oath. That flies in the face of our basic system and of the principles regarding the burden of proof.

Mr. McNamara: I shall deal later with some of the points raised by my hon. Friend.

Earl Warren, the famous chief justice of the American supreme court, put the case nicely when he said:

> "To declare that in the administration of the criminal law the end justifies the means . . . would bring terrible retribution. Against that pernicious doctrine, this court should resolutely set its face."

It is against this pernicious order that the House should set its face.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford) rose——

Mr. McNamara: It is obvious from the Government's behaviour that they are embarrassed about the steps that they are proposing and that they are not convinced of either their propriety or efficacy. The order bears the obvious signs of being a rushed measure, both in terms of the dubious reasoning put forward by the Government and in the drafting of the order. The Government's case is severely flawed both in terms of logic and honesty. The Secretary of State justifies the order by reference to the difficulties involved in dealing with paramilitaries and racketeers, yet he proposes this extension throughout the whole of the criminal justice system and does not confine it merely to emergency legislation.

At the same time, having observed the Northern Ireland experience, the Home Secretary has announced his intention to introduce similar legislation for England and Wales.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. McNamara: I will not give way to the hon. Gentleman. He was not here at the start of the debate; if he had been, I would have given way to him.

All the while, the Prime Minister appears to believe that this is merely a temporary restriction of civil liberties. The Government cannot have it both ways. Either the order is justified by reference to the specific difficulties of Northern Ireland—in which case it is unclear what relevance the order has to ordinary crime in England and Wales—or the Government have ulterior motives for taking away a fundamental civil right from everyone. The latter interpretation is the most plausible.

The Government have rested their case on selective and subjective grounds for what is a radical change in the criminal law. I attempted to secure answers about the evidence upon which the Government are taking action. My questions have all met with the same response:

> "Records are not maintained in the form which would permit the hon. Gentleman's question to be answered."

In effect, the Government have informed me that they do not know the answers or are not prepared to publish the evidence, so that we can look at what the police and the judiciary are saying. If the Government are not prepared to do that, we are not prepared to accept the order.

Similarly, the Government carefully resurrect the 16-year-old recommendations of the Criminal Law Revision Committee. They do not tell us how bitterly criticised that report was. Some of the more polite descriptions were "ill-fated", "notorious" or "fatally flawed", and the report was not implemented because it contained no evidence to justify the proposed changes.

Having resurrected that 16-year-old report, the Government appear to have buried the 1981 report of the Royal Commission on criminal procedure. The commission rejected the abolition of the right to silence. The commission has suddenly been censored out of existence, although the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 was based on it. Why, then, this selective amnesia? The answer is simple: the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister have once again subordinated the facts and the reality to the Prime Minister's prejudices.

To justify the order, the Government are making use of the police force in a scandalous manner. For short-term gain, the Government are threatening the hard-won independence of the police and of the Royal Ulster Constabulary. The credibility of a police force depends on its being seen to remain outside partisan politics, a difficult enough task in Northern Ireland. The Government are dragging in a crude attempt to mobilise the police for their own political ends.

The Government's case depends purely on anecdotal evidence from the police and the judiciary. They refuse to publish the representations made by the police and the judiciary. No serious research exists which would support the Government's claims. There is no evidence that the right to silence assists defendants, but, by dragging the police and the judiciary into the political fray, the Government are trying to establish a case at the expense of public confidence in the police, in the Royal Ulster Constabulary and in the Northern Irish bench.

It is quite easy to see the emptiness of the Government's case. The Government argue that people whom the police believe to be guilty either cannot be charged or, once charged, are acquitted by the courts because of the right to silence. Of course the police believe this to be the case—it would be extraordinary if the police were to arrest people they believed to be innocent or to charge those whom they believed to be innocent—but it is precisely for that reason that the investigation of crime and the trial are separate and distinct procedures. The purpose of the trial is to determine the validity or otherwise of the police case. I do not think that any rational police officer would wish that to be otherwise.

The Government's selective presentation of the facts to support their case gives way to downright dishonesty when they seek to draw parallels with the criminal procedure of the Republic of Ireland. I would welcome the Government's new-found commitment to harmonisation of policies in the two parts of Ireland, if it were sincere and complete. When, for instance, will three-judge hearings be introduced in the Diplock courts? When will we see harmonisation in a broad range of policy areas regarding security, which is vital if we are to reduce the divisions within Northern Ireland and between the North and the South? We look forward to those measures, but the Government have not yet introduced them. However, with regard to calling in aid the legislation of the Republic, the unfortunate truth is that the measures in this order have little in common with the practice in the Republic.

The abolition of the right to silence at trial was not even considered by the Irish Government. It is true that they proposed to admit the drawing of inferences from silence in the pre-trial phase, but that was rejected by the Oireachtas, the Irish Parliament. The similarities that exist are more apparent than real because of the disquiet that is felt by the Irish judiciary, which has refused to draw such inferences at trials. In an effort to find a case for the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister, the Government's propaganda machine has presented a travesty of the truth. They are not content with introducing their proposals by the back door, for they are attempting to justify them in a dishonest manner. The Irish experience refutes the Secretary of State's case rather than supporting it.

Mr. Harold McCusker (Upper Bann): My intervention might be of assistance to the Secretary of State. Can the hon. Gentleman tell us what the caution is in the Irish Republic on this issue?

Mr. McNamara: No, I cannot. It appears that the hon. Gentleman is seeking to help the Secretary of State. I am pleased about that, for it is the first piece of assistance that the Secretary of State has had from the hon. Gentleman since the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Presumably the purpose of this apparent dishonesty and the misleading of the House is for the "benefit" of the House and international community. Northern Ireland is an issue that has steadily become international, and the Government's efforts to campaign against the MacBride principles in the United States reflect this awareness. At the moment when the American people are exercising their democratic rights, the Government are adopting measures that inspire a great deal of hostility towards Britain in the United States and throughout the world.

Last week, the House voted to violate the first amendment of the American constitution, which is the freedom of the press. Tonight, as America votes for a president, we are undermining the fifth amendment, which is the right not to incriminate oneself. The case for the paramilitarists in Northern Ireland could not have been better put than by the introduction of the measures that are before us.

These issues arouse the fury of Irish-Americans and of all citizens within that country. A British citizen wrote to me from California in these terms:

"Many thoughtful Americans are deeply shocked that the British Government should contemplate the abolition of our own equivalent of the fifth amendment. Traditionally, Britain has enjoyed an enviable reputation in the world as a champion of civil liberties, but the present Government seem to care nothing for this. Mrs. Thatcher and her Ministers appear to be totally insensitive to irreparable damage that they are doing to our international reputation as a freedom-loving country."

Thus the Government, by their own actions, have made life far more difficult for those American leaders who attempt to play a constructive and educational role over the question of Northern Ireland and have strengthened the hands of those in North America who are apologists for violence.

The Secretary of State has attempted to present the order as one that introduces relatively limited changes in the criminal law. He described it as a "modest proposal". That is not so. We are being asked to overturn one of the pillars of the British system of justice. The Secretary of State is being disingenuous when he says that the proposed changes are relatively minor. They are not. They represent a dramatic and drastic move away from our adversarial system to an inquisitorial system.

In some ways, the debate is hindered by the use of the term "the right to silence". The law states that the prosecution must prove the guilt of a defendant beyond reasonable doubt and without the assistance of the defendant. That principle is based on three assumptions. First, it is presumed that the accused is innocent until proved guilty. Secondly, it is recognised that proving a negative is often impossible. Thirdly, confessions are admissible only if given voluntarily. The order violates all these axioms of the criminal law.

The onus of proof is being placed upon the defendant. A suspect, often without legal advice, or without any clear knowledge of what he or she is suspected of having done, will be required to demonstrate innocence. There is a presumption that reasonable suspicion can be equated with guilt. Particularly worrying is the requirement to prove a negative. This affects both the general issue of innocence and the specific case of the so-called ambush defence. Suspects will be required to mention any fact that may be used in their future defence.

It is possible to be reasonably sure that a suspect imparted certain information, but one cannot be so certain that a suspect did not do so. It is one thing to tape-record an interview in a police station—in the majority of cases that we are considering in Northern Ireland, which will be scheduled cases or terrorist cases, that will not be the position—and another to keep records of what happens outside the police station. Who is to decide what constitutes a relevant fact, to decide which apparently minor detail may later take on a great deal of significance? This is a form of retroactive punishment, where the absence of foresight will be penalised in the trial procedure.

Mr. Barry Porter: I have no doubt that the hon. Gentleman realises that there has already been a breach of that principle in the requirement in United Kingdom law for notice of alibi to be given. If a defendant chooses to raise an alibi defence, notice must be given to the prosecution by the defence so that such a defence cannot be raised at the trial without the prosecution having the opportunity to study and check that defence. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will address his mind to whether that which is proposed is merely a continuation of that breach or something fundamentally different.

Mr. McNamara: I think that it is fundamentally different, for the reason that I shall advance. I do not object to the requirement that notice of alibi must be given to the prosecution, but that is not what will happen under the order.

No confession can be regarded as voluntary once the order is in force. Voluntary confessions imply that one has the right not to talk. If we take that right away, every confession, as a matter of logic, becomes involuntary. It is quite obvious that the order involves a degree of coercion on the suspect or the accused. The order will provide more work for lawyers, the Court of Appeal, the House of Lords and, unfortunately for Britain's reputation, the European Court of Human Rights. It will needlessly complicate the law of evidence and embroil the courts in what is ultimately political conflict.

I return to the issue raised by the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter), who represents the posh end of Merseyside. I think that he is right when he talks about ambushes and giving notice of alibis, but that is not the purpose of the order as it has been drafted. That does not bear on the way on which involuntary confessions will come out, as it were. We are dealing with a form of coercion. If someone does not say something, that fact will be noted and reference will be made to it.

Those who wish to introduce an ambush alibi will not be prevented from taking that course. Those who choose not to remain silent—for example, hardened terrorists—will have their alibis prepared. They will have Sammy Wilson in a pub on the Shankill. Perhaps that was an unfortunate choice of words, for I was not referring to the lord mayor. As I was saying, they will have Sammy Taylor in a pub in the Shankill or Seamus O'Keane in the Falls, ready to swear that someone was somewhere else when the time came. The paramilitarist will not be affected in any way. In other words, the order will not affect them.

We cannot consider the order without reference to the existing criminal law in Northern Ireland and to the changes that are proposed in the draft Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 (Code of Practice) Order 1988. The police have already been granted extensive powers in the emergency legislation. These powers have been recognised as resulting from the conflict in Northern Ireland, powers which would not be on the statute book otherwise. We must therefore think carefully before adding to the many provisions which already exist within the emergency powers. Extension of police powers in the past has not ended the conflict, and it is unlikely that it will do so in future. It is unlikely that the balance that the Secretary of State is looking for in the courts will be restored, if it needs to be.

It is already an offence to withhold information about terrorist activities, under section 11 of the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1984. Much concern has been expressed about the relationship between the order and section 11, not least by the Law Society of Northern Ireland. It seems that it believes that the combination of the two would provide an incentive for a modified version of the discredited supergrass system.

There can be no short cuts in the fight against crime. Investigation and the careful accumulation of evidence must be the basis of policing in Northern Ireland. Such an extension of police powers will only make investigation more difficult, as it undermines the credibility of the criminal law and of the police.

The Government have attempted to justify the measure by arguing that the right to silence was introduced to defend the individual against the arbitrary use of power in a despotism. Now the Secretary of State has said that, given the safeguards in the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1987, the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, and easy access to legal advice, the proposals for non-paramilitary offences in the draft order are no longer necessary. Once again, he is being misleading.

In Northern Ireland, as in the rest of the United Kingdom, the police have no statutory duty to inform a suspect of his rights. More important, since the commencement of the Emergency Provisions Act in June 1987, the statutory right to access to legal advice has been severely qualified. Over half the requests for legal advice were rejected under section 15(5) of the Act. That argument cannot be used to justify the proposed changes in the law of evidence. If the Secretary of State was claiming that power, he should have been able to say that in every case in which application was made for legal advice it was granted. In 50 per cent. of cases, it was not.

Detailed examination of the order also produces a distinct lack of confidence in the Government's wisdom in pursuing such a course. I am particularly concerned by the vagueness of article 3(1), which requires individuals to account for their presence in a particular place. There is no question of legal advice or of being in a police station where such an interrogation might be recorded. There is no requirement for officers to identify themselves, or for the accused to be informed of the crime of which he is suspected.

The Secretary of State says that there will be cautionary notice, but we are expected to pass the legislation before even seeing the form of caution that it will contain. Where will the caution be given, and what record will there be of the replies? Will the accused be cautioned in the back of a Land Rover going up to Castlereagh? Will he be picked up on the Shankill or the Falls and be told, "We believe that you are guilty of this offence. What have you to say about it? I am giving you a caution."? Will there be a proper system, or will there be no tape recordings? The possible lack of a caution, and the circumstances in which a caution is administered, are a fundamental worry. Was a witness present when the alleged caution was administered?

Sadly, many innocent people have lost their lives through being in the wrong place at the wrong time in Northern Ireland. It is worrying that presence in a particular place will in itself give rise to reasonable suspicion. The implications for such cases as that of Oliver Hughes, the brother of one of my constituents killed at Loughall, are terrifying. If mere presence might imply guilt, the scope of the definition of reasonable force as used by the security forces is likely to extend even further. That danger has not been taken on board. In the battle against the paramilitaries we must be guided by our minds as well as by our feelings of revulsion. We must ask ourselves not whether the Government's intentions are honourable, but what will be the likely practical effects of the order.

The abolition of the right to silence is likely to make no difference to the guilty, but will have a detrimental effect on the innocent. The innocent have much to fear, as case law shows. The Secretary of State says they have nothing to fear, but they are the only people likely to be intimidated by their surroundings into making misleading concessions. If he wishes me to, I shall give way to the right hon. Gentleman and cite all the cases, including that of Winston Kerr in Windsor. When he was challenged, police obtained a 25-page confession from him. As a result of the order, we can expect more convictions of the innocent, while the position of the guilty remains unchanged. What better recipe could there be for accentuating the sense of injustice in Northern Ireland?

The Criminal Bar Association has warned that the abolition of the right to silence is likely to constitute a disincentive to investigation by the police. A policing strategy that over-emphasises interrogation at the expense of investigation is not likely to work; it smacks more of inquisition. The order, far from facilitating the work of the police, will provide a barrier against effective policing. The "neutrals" to whom I referred earlier will be further discouraged from co-operating with the RUC. Giving greater powers to the police has traditionally weakened, not strengthened, public confidence in them.

The order involves a shift of authority from the judiciary to the police, the transfer of the trial from the courtroom to the interrogation room, from the Crumlin road court house to Castlereagh. It presumes that the fact of arrest implies a greater degree of guilt than has previously been the case. The preferring of charges will take on much greater significance in the determination of guilt. That is not conducive to public confidence in the system of justice.

The adversarial system of our common law is being replaced by an inquisitorial one. There may be many legitimate arguments about the respective merits of the two systems. I note, however, that continental inquisitorial systems such as those of Belgium and Sweden do not enjoy the full confidence of the British tabloid press. But what we should not forget is that, in democratic countries where inquisitorial systems exist, investigations are quasi-judicial, being closely supervised by examining magistrates. The order does not include any such safeguards for suspects in Northern Ireland, nor will there be any for suspects in the United Kingdom. We would therefore have the worst of both systems.

My fear is that the order will have exactly the opposite effect from that which is intended. It will damage the image of the police and judiciary in Northern Ireland. It will make it harder for elected representatives to give the kind of endorsement of the RUC that the Government expect, and which the Opposition realise can be given only when public confidence exists in fact rather than in rhetoric. This is a profoundly retrograde step, which indicates despair on the part of the Government and will undermine the spirit of the Anglo-Irish Agreement. By turning the screw of repression, the Government wind up the spring of violence.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Rightly, there is a great deal of interest in this debate. I know that Mr. Speaker would wish me to appeal for short speeches so that all hon. Members who wish to participate can do so.

5.17 pm

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) touched frequently on what I consider the crucial issue before the House: how will the order obtain the support and confidence of the people of Northern Ireland? Let us suppose that we meet a constitutional Nationalist from Northern Ireland and say to him, "Yes, there has been a change in the right to silence, which has been considered by lawyers throughout the ages to be one of the absolute rights of a person accused of a crime." How do we persuade that person that the changes, which I believe in general to be right, have been carefully considered and properly argued over and that he, when accused in Northern Ireland, will be dealt with by a law that has gone through the proper process of being "chewed over" in the House of Commons? It will be very difficult to satisfy him of that after today's proceedings.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was unable to answer my question about why the Bill procedure was not used. May I offer an explanation? It is because the Government continue to hanker after the opportunity to go for devolution. Twice since the mid-1970s the position of the minority in particular has been undermined by the attempt at a constitutional gerrymandering of some form of devolved assembly. Of course, that suits the Government. They will say, "Ah, but of course the procedure that we now have to follow in the House of Commons is most defective. We change the criminal law in Northern Ireland by order. It does not give us an opportunity to consider it properly, but it has to be done on the nod. The only way in which that can be changed is by having a devolved assembly." Of course, that is nonsense.

The contents of the order should be contained in a Bill, and what would that mean? Let us suppose, for the sake of argument, that a constitutional Republican is sitting in the Gallery today, saying to himself, "Well, I fear that my cousin may from time to time be on the fringe of violent and IRA activities. I want to be satisfied that he is convicted only after he has committed an offence. I want to be satisfied that my cousin is treated properly and in the same way as any other person suspected of a crime." I would say to him, "My friend, I accept that there are many different views about whether the right to silence should be absolute. Yes, academic views are undecided and divided on this point. There are those, for instance, like myself, who have practised at the criminal bar for a lifetime and, none the less, are prepared to say that the right to silence should be somewhat modified. There are others, like my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), who take a different view."

I would say to this constitutional Republican in the Gallery: "This issue will be fought out and argued on the Floor of the House of Commons. All aspects of the measure will be argued properly and, when the law finally comes to be applied to you or your cousin, it will be a law that has been properly considered." However, if the order were adopted, the constitutional Nationalist would say, "I have little support for the way in which they do things in Westminster. This sort of measure can go through on the nod by an order." It is because the Secretary of State has a vested interest in trying to show that the procedures in this place are defective that he has chosen the order procedure.

Mr. Gow: Does any hon. Member, or even my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, believe that this is a sensible procedure for enacting such fundamental legislation? Does my hon. Friend agree that there would be continuing uproar in this place if we sought to make similar changes for England and Wales by this procedure?

Mr. Budgen: I can only say as quietly and as carefully as I can that I believe that our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had a perfectly good opportunity at the beginning of the debate to explain, in response to a question from me, what disadvantage would be suffered if this matter were dealt with by the Bill procedure, but he did not answer my question.

The fact is that this is being knocked through by the order procedure in a way that can only undermine the confidence of those who believe, or should believe, that Westminster is here to safeguard their rights against the Executive. Surely that is the basis of the case. That is what all of us who believe in what I know is unfashionably called integration argue for. We say to the constitutional Nationalists, "Yes, perhaps there are some Protestants in Northern Ireland who are a bit too close to the game to be able to see sometimes exactly where your rights are, but come to Westminster, where there are those who are detached and have a lifelong interest in the rights of the individual and in personal liberty."

We argue that that is the advantage of an imperial, as opposed to a devolved, Parliament. Those rights are being taken away because, since the early 1970s, the Northern Ireland Office has constantly whored after the idea of a devolved Parliament and because it wishes to say that our proceedings are defective. They are not. They can be used properly, and they should be used properly tonight.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): The hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) was undoubtedly right to focus upon the impropriety of the means by which Parliament is removing this bulwark of the rule of law.

Whatever view one may hold about the situation in Northern Ireland, hon. Members cannot believe that the method of legislation that we are engaged in today or the manner in which the Secretary of State brought forward this proposal was appropriate. He did so by a written question without any trailer, without any serious press leaks—the way in which the Government usually communicate their information about important matters—and without hon. Members being given an opportunity to question him upon the reasons for the proposal. In saying that he proposes something comparable in England and Wales, the Secretary of State has at least given us some opportunity to discuss it. He has said that he has set up an internal Government committee to review these matters and to consider whether or not the evidence that he will have to deploy is sufficient to bring about a reversal in our legal system, which has widely been seen as a pillar of the rule of law.

The manner in which the procedure was carried out must call in question the motives and the strength of the Secretary of State's case. This afternoon, the Secretary of State gave little evidence that the existence of the right to silence brings about miscarriages of justice. He asserted that many people before the courts in Northen Ireland use their right to silence, but he has not said—he could not say—that that has resulted in miscarriages of justice. By pulling on our emotional heartstrings and calling upon our worry for the judiciary in Northern Ireland, he has suggested that there is some link between what he is doing today and the prospects for restoring law and order. However, he has failed to give the House any signs that he has understood either the significance or the enormity of what he is proposing.

What is guaranteed in other countries by their constitutions is to be swept aside by the House, following a three-hour debate, with about a dozen of the Secretary of State's supporters here to listen to it, and with the full weight of Government Whips ensuring that the legislation will be carried. That is a constitutional outrage, and a monstrous way to proceed. It is only because those of us who follow Northern Ireland affairs have a great deal of sympathy with anyone who is the incumbent of the office of the right hon. Gentleman that we do not express ourselves in even stronger language when talking about him personally. I fear that, when people take up the office that the right hon. Gentleman holds, they lose their sense of perspective of the democratic rights and wrongs which have brought them to the House, and of their attachment to the rule of law that they claim to be defending in Northern Ireland.

The essence of this matter is that the Secretary of State is casting aside not merely the practice in Northern Ireland since the troubles began, but a principle of English law that has existed for centuries and one that is enshrined in the fifth amendment to the United States constitution. That principle is crucial as a guarantee of the right of every citizen in this country to the assumption that he is innocent until proved guilty. In all honesty, that right will no longer be said to exist in the Province. That reversal of the burden of truth, which is a consequence of the Secretary of State's actions, would not stand up in any other system of common law. We are driven to the conclusion that the Secretary of State is dishonouring Parliament by asking us to approve such an order. He is asking us to be, in some way, complicit to that decision.

We are faced with the most repulsive step down the road to the abrogation of the rule of law that the Secretary of State has taken. The right hon. Gentleman is well aware that I have supported him and his Government in their endeavours to bring about the restoration of constitutional normality to the Province. I have been disposed to give him the benefit of the doubt whenever doubt has existed, but there is no doubt about the order.

Mr. Cash: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that he agrees with the Anglo-Irish Agreement? Does he also know that in the Irish Republic sections 18 and 19 of the Criminal Justice Act 1984 confer the same permissive powers? How does he square that with what is contained in the order?

Mr. Maclennan: I believe that the Anglo-Irish Agreement has been tested almost to destruction. With regard to the Republic's legislation, I have never thought it appropriate for the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland to model itself on its legislation. The very differences that exist may be part of the reason why Ireland chose to withdraw from the United Kingdom.

We face a peculiar situation in which the Secretary of State of the Conservative and Unionist party has to pray in aid the Republic's legislation—incidentally, the order will not be implemented effectively by the courts—in support of this repugnant order.

When the Secretary of State was questioned by his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) about the manner of the legislation, he gave the interesting reply that he was willing to enter into discussions with parties in the House about the mode of that legislation. Was that a serious offer? Is he willing to reconsider how we legislate in this House? Is he willing to meet all parties to discuss these matters? If he is willing, let him say so.

Mr. Tom King: I said that I would.

Mr. Maclennan: That may prove to be something that many of us would wish to follow up. Hitherto, the right hon. Gentleman has not shown himself to be forthcoming on such matters.

The Government's case is not supported by any empirical evidence that what the right hon. Gentleman has proposed will make the slightest difference to conviction rates. It could not. It has not been supported by any independent evidence, because none has been forthcoming.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the 1972 report from the Criminal Law Revision Committee. When that report was published, it was met with a resounding dismissal from everyone who considered it seriously. He has paid little attention to the 1981 Royal Commission —the Philips commission—on criminal procedure. In the light of the right hon. Gentleman's neglect of that report, it is worth recalling some of its specific remarks about the right to silence. It is especially important to draw attention to its conclusion about that right.

On page 90 of its report, the Royal Commission stated:

"All but one of us incline to the view that any modification to the present law of evidence which aimed at requiring the accused to answer a prima facie case established by the prosecution would be likely to weaken the initial burden of proof that the accusatorial system of trial places upon the prosecution. The accused should not be obliged, indeed, in the ultimate event he cannot be obliged, either to enter the witness box or to mount any defence".

Earlier, it said:

"It might put strong (and additional) psychological pressure upon some suspects to answer questions without knowing precisely what was the substance of and evidence for the accusations against them; and in consequence what they needed to tell the police in order to allay the suspicion against them. This, in our view, might well increase the risk of innocent people, particularly those under suspicion for the first time, making damaging statements . . . any attempt . . . to use a suspect's silence as evidence against him seems to run counter to a central element in the accusatorial system of trial. There is an inconsistency of principle in requiring the onus of proof at trial to be upon the prosecution and to be discharged without any assistance from the accused's silence in the face of police questioning under caution as any part of their case against him at trial."

That was weighty opinion, and it was thought profoundly compelling by the the Government of that time, of which the right hon. Gentleman was a member, by all the preceding Secretaries of State for Northern Ireland and by the Law Officers.

No one has hitherto proposed to end the right of silence, and the Secretary of State adopted a cavalier manner in doing so. We shall vote against the order if necessary, but we hope that, in the light of the debate, the Secretary of State will see fit not to press it to a vote.

5.37 pm

Mr. James Kilfedder (North, Down): Over the years, I have many times criticised the Order in Council procedure that is applied to legislation and other matters affecting Northern Ireland. Together with my colleagues, I have sought the support of other hon. Members in our condemnation of the autocratic and colonial way in which Northern Ireland is governed. I do not intend to detain the House by repeating everything that I have said in the past. It is all on the record.

Some criticism has been made of devolution. I believe that the hon. Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) should study the work of the late Northern Ireland Assembly. If that Assembly had had this order to consider, it would have spent many hours, days and weeks on it and would have produced an extremely good report. It produced excellent reports, which have been commended ever since.

My Unionist colleagues and I believe that the profound change in the law in Northern Ireland should not be made in advance of a similar change to the law in the rest of the United Kingdom. There are many sensible reasons for amending the existing law, but I am afraid that what will happen—we have already discussed this—is that the change will provoke another attack on Northern Ireland and on the decent law-abiding people of the Province.

By some extraordinary convolution of logic, which is peculiar to politicians, or at least to some, the people of Northern Ireland will be blamed for this change in the law. The blame will be placed, not only on their shoulders, but on the shoulders of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, of members of the Ulster Defence Regiment and of members of the Regular Army, as well as all the judges and everybody else connected with security and the administration of justice in Northern Ireland. My colleagues and I say that it is not fair that everything should be twisted to condemn people who have suffered for 20 long years from obscene terrorism. Against that background, this is a modest measure.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Kilfedder: I shall give way shortly. I must be brief, because Madam Deputy Speaker issued an order to that effect.

I do not ask the Government to delay this legislation, but even at this late stage I ask them to introduce the legislation promised by the Home Secretary in May this year, when he announced the establishment of a working group that included a representative from the Northern Ireland Office. In a written answer the right hon. Gentleman anticipated that joint action would be taken, because he stated:

"Since there will be implications for law and practice in Northern Ireland, I am . . . arranging for an official from his office to serve on the group."—[Official Report, 18 May 1988; Vol. 133, c. 466.]

[Mr. Kilfedder]

The right hon. Gentleman was referring to the Northern Ireland Office. If that is the right law for Northern Ireland, there is no reason whatever for delaying the introduction of the change in Great Britain. Change is needed. There is constant change in the law.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) talked about the right of silence having existed in its present form for centuries, but at one time under the common law a defendant on a criminal charge could not, at an assize, speak one word in his defence. He was prohibited from doing so on the basis that it would be wrong for a defendant's own words to be used to convict. In time it was seen that a change in that law was necessary. Change took place, and we continue to have change.

The last major change in criminal trials, which was introduced in the House 22 years ago, was opposed bitterly inside and outside the House. It was introduced to get rid of the need for a unanimous verdict when a defendant appeared on a criminal charge. It allowed for replacement by a majority verdict after the jury had disagreed and after a reasonable time. There was an outcry about that, but it was introduced by the Labour Government, by the distinguished former leader of the Social Democratic party, Lord Jenkins as he now is. It was backed by the distinguished former Lord Chancellor, Sir Elwyn Jones, who was the then Attorney-General.

Every change is seen as an attack on civil liberties, but that radical change was found to be necessary. As the then Attorney-General said, there was "mounting and formidable evidence that in London at least attempts have been made and are taking place on a considerable scale to corrupt individual jurors."

The Attorney-General added:

"it is difficult to prove these matters by way of evidence."

—[Official Report, 12 December 1966, Vol. 738, c. 203.]

That was the reply to those who opposed the Attorney-General in the House.

Mr. Flannery: I am saddened to hear the hon. Gentleman welcome this draconian measure, which can only deepen the problem. Does he not realise that the Government are acting out of sheer frustration? Their policies are not doing what they want, they have nowhere to turn and, in desperation, they are introducing the measure precisely because they have no real answer to the problem in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Kilfedder: The hon. Gentleman has proved what I said at the beginning of my speech: it is wrong that the order should be introduced separately from changes for the rest of the United Kingdom.

I say this to the hon. Gentleman and everybody else who criticises the order. The changes have been mooted for many years by distinguished jurists and judges. The distinguished Jeremy Bentham, who should be a hero to the hon. Gentleman and other Opposition Members, said in an essay on judicial evidence in 1825:

"Innocence claims the right of speaking, as guilt invokes the privilege of silence."

It was the opinion of that distinguished mind that the existing criminal law operated to protect the guilty and that a change should be made.

Mr. McNamara: Does the hon. Gentleman recall that, at the time when Jeremy Bentham was writing, the accused had no right to speak in his own defence, which he has now, and there was no police force? We in the Opposition believe that the Government of the workhouses is the Government of the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher), and that was the Government of Jeremy Bentham.

Mr. Kilfedder: I shall not get involved in the fight between the Labour party and the Conservative party. It is clear what was in the mind of Dr. Bentham, and I do not wish to depart from that.

The 11th report on evidence of the Criminal Law Revision Committee, which was published in 1972, made proposals for restricting the right to silence. I have a quotation, but as time is short, I shall not read it out.

It is common knowledge among legal practitioners in Britain that hardened criminals manipulate the law to their advantage. Having practised at the criminal bar in London, I know what happens in trials here. When depositions are provided by the prosecution at the commital proceedings to the defence, certain solicitors are reputed to sit down with the defendant or defendants and prepare a defence that can be woven around the prosecution's case. They have the depositions before them and, if the defendant or defendants have not said a word, subsequently at the trial before a jury they can put forward a case that has been carefully prepared to meet, and not to contest, most of the prosecution's case.

Criminals do not even need the help of solicitors to instruct them in how to manipulate the law. Hardened and experienced criminals know that it is better to stay silent and subsequently to produce their evidence, which a jury might accept as the truth or as sufficient to create reasonable doubt.

The Secretary of State said that the object of a criminal trial is to establish the innocence or guilt of the accused. That is all that the law is about. Protection must be seen in that light. In Northern Ireland, terrorists and paramilitary racketeers—sadly, there are far too many racketeers—are living off the people in certain areas. The terrorists are told by the godfathers of obscene atrocities and by their paramilitary masters to remain silent when they are apprehended by the police or the security forces. That is why it was found necessary, in the Irish Republic in 1984, to restrict that right of silence on certain grounds, and there is no problem there compared with our problem.

The arguments that have been used against the Government today could be used against the people of the Irish Republic, and they would not like it. The remarks that have been made are most offensive. I am, have been and will be critical of the Government, but we are now aiming to maintain a balance in the law in Northern Ireland. In my view, the change in the law is a matter of restoring the balance in Northern Ireland. It is common sense not to allow the criminals to mock and manipulate the law and to use it to their own advantage. It is our duty as Members of Parliament to ensure that those evil men are subjected to a sensible law and its sanctions. The people of this country—that includes Northern Ireland as well as the rest of the United Kingdom—expect nothing less of us.

5.50 pm

Mr. A. E. P. Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): John Milton admonished his countrymen:

"Let not England forget her precedence of teaching nations how to live."

Since Magna Carta, England has been a light to all nations, establishing and maintaining what, in an earlier age, were called "the rights of man."

The civil liberties of the individual and the limited power of the state, which are enshrined in English common law and the constitution, have been among Britain's greatest contributions to the advance of civilisation. However, that bequest is crumbling under the corrupting influence of Britain's floundering involvement in the quagmire of Northern Ireland.

The mother of Parliaments is being asked today by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to revoke one of England's keystone liberties—the right of the accused to be free of the compulsion to bear witness against himself. That freedom is so fundamental to a just society that the founders of the American nation enshrined it in the Bill of Rights. It is a jealously guarded right—and properly so—because it goes to the root of the proposition that an accused person is innocent until proven guilty and should not be obliged to give self-incriminating evidence.

I know that the issue raises fierce emotions. It divides lawyers, because many senior judges support abolition, as we have been reminded by the hon. Member for North, Down (Mr. Kilfedder), whereas the criminal bar fervently opposes abolition.

Any loss of traditional safeguards and any departure from the age-old protections of the common law must be regretted, and it ought to be any society's stated objective to retrieve such safeguards and protections as soon as circumstances permit. The insidious aspect of the presentation made this afternoon by the Secretary of State, apart from its general vagueness, is that no such return—nor the possibility of such a return—appears to be contemplated. Indeed, it is feared that these modifications of the right to silence will become a permanent part of the law, not just in Northern Ireland but in Britain.

Are there any circumstances in which the right to silence can properly be abridged? Is it a right from which we can derogate? The Government in Dublin, as we have been reminded several times, thought so three years ago when the Criminal Justice Bill was enacted. Now the Dublin Government have expressed themselves deeply concerned about that move and have suggested that the 1984 Act was comparatively limited in its effect on the right to silence.

The central questions raised by today's proposals are, first, whether the new measures will help to reduce violence and save lives; secondly, whether they will help to bring about a break in the political impasse; and, thirdly, whether they can achieve those aims without obliging the community to pay too high a price in the loss of traditional safeguards and liberties. The answer to the first question is, probably, yes—at least in the short term. Whether such a reduction would have any significant bearing on the political situation is less clear. The new measures will probably help to put some guilty men away, but they will also reinforce the sense of grievance among those in the Nationalist community who view British policy in Northern Ireland essentially in terms of continuing repressive legislation.

The Secretary of State has complained, in an attempt to justify his extraordinary proposal, that justice is being thwarted. Probably it is. Miscreants have always taken advantage of constitutional protections, which are designed to shield the innocent against the abuse of the state's police powers. Yet the tradition of free men is to make a self-conscious choice that, in the words of another Englishman, Sir William Blackstone:

"It is better that ten guilty persons escape than one innocent suffer."

The problem of Ulster is threatening to unhinge the Government. I agree with the point made in an intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery). The Government's move to abolish protections against self-incrimination follows hard on another over-reaction—the recent press ban on broadcasting interviews with outlawed IRA members. In the battle against violence, democratic Governments have the right to protect themselves, and they must, of course, employ every legal weapon that is available to them. However, they cannot sacrifice fundamental rights without risking the loss of the civilised societies that they purport to protect.

5.57 pm

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South): You asked hon. Members to speak briefly, Madam Deputy Speaker, so I shall do that.

It takes a great deal for me to stand here and say that I shall be unable to support the Government in the Lobby tonight. The hon. Member for Paisley, North (Mr. Adams), who now resides silently in the Opposition Whips' office, has been known to refer to me in more social atmospheres as a Liverpool Orangeman—a description to which I take no particular exception. I should normally support anything that the Government or the Northern Ireland Office can do to ensure that terrorists, whether the Provisional IRA or Loyalist paramilitaries, are convicted. I have supported such measures in the past and I shall support them in due course. I do not take the view that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is Machiavellian in what he is trying to do. By his own lights, he is trying to ensure that those who maim and murder are put where they belong, but, he has got it wrong.

I do not need to rehearse the principles again. A fundamental principle of the law of the United Kingdom is about to be breached, and I do not think that it should be breached in a couple of hours on a gloomy November afternoon in the presence of a couple of dozen hon. Members. I support every word in the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, South-West (Mr. Budgen) about that point, which I do not need to develop.

At some stage in future we shall have similar legislation for England and Wales—but I hope that it will not be introduced in a similar way. I support the point made by the hon. Member for North, Down (Mr. Kilfedder), that legislation for Northern Ireland should be introduced together with legislation for England and Wales. I have always taken the view that one of the enormous difficulties in maintaining the Union is the myth that Northern Ireland is more separate from the rest of the United Kingdom than Scotland or Wales. However, that is a matter for another debate, although it cannot be right for a fundamental change to be taking place in this way, and I shall take some persuading that the right to silence should be changed anyway.

I have one novel point to make. The right to silence was brought in originally because defendants were illiterate, incoherent and unable to advance their views sensibly when being interrogated. I have the advantage of making a modest living outside the House as an advocate, not at the criminal bar, but in rather dodgier circumstances in Liverpool magistrates court. We had the advantage of carrying out the trial run of interviews being taped. If anybody believes that the common run of criminal is not illiterate, incoherent and unable to express himself, I invite him to come to my office at any time and I shall prove that nothing much has changed over the past 200 years. If the right to silence is to be removed, we must have a carefully considered debate at a proper time. This is not such a debate and it is not the time.

5.59 pm

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): I appreciate the remarks of the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter), and I shall try to reinforce them later in my speech. I shall also try to be brief, as I know that many hon. Members wish to speak.

Let me start with a word of sympathy for the Secretary of State. He has an extremely difficult and dangerous task to perform, and in most cases he does so with great skill and courage. I do not attack his general approach to his terrible problem. Anyone who has had to live through the appalling consequences of terror in Northern Ireland and on the mainland—and we all wake up in the morning to hear and see exactly what has happened—must be listened to when he says that he needs different powers to deal with the problem, and I make my remarks against that background. Nevertheless, the Government are doing something extremely dangerous. They should never have thought of introducing such a measure in this way, and I hope that even at this late stage they may think again.

In the past two weeks, the House of Commons has been presented with two measures that alter fundamental rights upheld for many generations. Furthermore, those measures have been introduced by edict, without any possibility of amendment. Last week, the Home Secretary issued an edict altering the exercise of free speech in Northern Ireland, and presumably that will also happen elsewhere. I protested that we needed a Bill to deal with such an important matter, as we could then consider it more carefully. If we had a Bill in this case, the proposal would certainly not reach the statute book in the form in which it has been presented to the House.

The Secretary of State said that there had already been much argument about the matter, but he did not give the impression in his answers that he had gone into it in great detail. He did not know the essential answers to the most important questions. That is one reason why we have the legislative process. It is a great derogation of the rights of the House for the Government to think that they can abolish them twice in two weeks.

Mr. Budgen: Does not the moral authority of Parliament rest upon the proposition that experts, such as lawyers, advance their arguments for the broad mass of people, as represented by hon. Members, to consider and chew them over? When we legislate through the order-making process, the constitutional safeguards of the individual are abrogated.

Mr. Foot: I fully agree with the hon. Gentleman and with the protest that he and other hon. Members made at the beginning of the debate. I hope that we shall be able to make a dent at least in the Government's intentions, and that we shall not allow this process to be used again.

The Secretary of State will say that the present method of dealing with legislation in Northern Ireland has been in place for a considerable time—and I remember the procedures that were used when I was Leader of the House—but that is not an excuse. When I was Leader of the House, we were seeking to find new methods of dealing with Northern Ireland legislation. We made significant constitutional changes in Northern Ireland because we believed that the people of Northern Ireland had a proper right to put their case in the House. That is why the change in the numbers was carried. There should be a proper legislative process for dealing with matters affecting Northern Ireland, and people in Northern Ireland have every right to complain if the Government do nothing about it.

We shall shortly be entering a new Session. In his own interests, the Secretary of State should fight for the introduction of a proper process for dealing with Northern Ireland legislation to replace this hole-in-the-corner rough-house. The present method is not a proper way of dealing with such far-reaching measures. The hon. Member for Wirral, South has underlined afresh the case made by those of my hon. Friends who have spoken—that this measure represents a major change in the operation of the law. It has been said that it will be extended to the country as a whole. That is all the more reason for incorporating it in a major Bill.

If the right of evidence and the right of an innocent person to protections that he has hitherto enjoyed are to be reversed in the United Kingdom as a whole, they will certainly not be done by order. Such changes would have to be accompanied by a general change in the law and there would then be no reason whatever why the contents of this order could not be incorporated in a Bill duly presented to the House.

Opposition Members will oppose the change because we believe that the principle is utterly repugnant. It would be a scandal if the House allowed such a measure to go through as the Government originally proposed it, and I am glad that it has been opposed by right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House.

The debate has been brief, but I hope that, in his own interests and in the interests of Parliament, the Secretary of State will say to the Government, "Never again must measures of this nature be presented to the House in this form." If the Secretary of State wants to protect his own position and uphold justice in Northern Ireland, that is the proper way to proceed. If the Secretary of State and the Government continue in this manner, they will undermine the authority of Parliament itself.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): No hon. Member could have more regard than I have for the courage, determination and integrity of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, but he has been badly misled by someone or some group into presenting a completely disingenuous case for an order that is rushed and ill thought out. It will not have my support, and I shall explain why.

My right hon. Friend seems to think that the right to silence is one of the most important obstacles in the way of the conviction of guilty murdering and hateful terrorists. I have seldom heard such nonsense. If there is evidence from eye witnesses, forensic experts, evidence of letters, maps, diagrams and fingerprints, the defendant is likely to be convicted whether or not he has admitted his own guilt.

If there is no such evidence and the police allege only an admission of guilt or an insufficient explanation, the defendant is unlikely to be convicted because juries and judges, even in the Diplock courts—perhaps I should say especially in the Diplock courts—appreciate the ease of fabricating an admission. They usually require other evidence proving its truthfulness. Such a method is on its way—the tape-recorded interview of the suspect by police officers—but it has not yet become universal. Until that becomes universal, it is unnecessary for us to tinker with the right to silence in the belief that what the defendant says will contribute in one way or another to his guilt.

In either of the circumstances that I have outlined, I believe that the existence or otherwise of the right to silence is monumentally irrelevant. If one wanted to wring a confession of guilt out of a reluctant subject one might have to torture him, but of course that is wholly unacceptable and unthinkable. It is precisely because a man who has been tortured might not only confess his guilt, but might well confess his guilt although innocent, that we abolished torture and protected a person accused by giving him the right to say, "I have a right to be silent. I will say nothing. You produce evidence to prove your case."

Without torture, how can one force a man to speak? Can one pretend that what he says will not be used against him later and then use it? No, that is not allowed. Can one trick him by some promise or frighten him by some threat? No, that is not allowed. A guilty man cannot be forced to speak—nor can anything that he says under force be used in evidence against him—because of the danger that an innocent man might incriminate himself.

Those who do not understand our law should not seek to twist and distort it because of their understandable frustration. My right hon. Friend said today, and has said before, that terrorists can abuse and exploit the system by remaining silent. That merely shows whither frustration leads. What sort of right is it if people can be attacked for taking advantage of it? Is that not evidence of the danger of making ill-considered statements in support of ill-considered orders?

Of course my right hon. Friend is frustrated—we all are. Terrorism is appalling and must be stopped. It is deplorable that we cannot do more to stop it. Perhaps if we introduced capital punishment we would be doing more to stop it, but our horror should not blind us to our responsibilities to operate a reputable system of justice. Nor should it blind us into thinking that any interference with the right to silence, however limited or closely defined, will lead to the conviction of more who are guilty. It cannot, and it will not.

Nevertheless, it may surprise some hon. Members to hear that I am not an avid supporter of the right to silence. It is a sacred cow, but it is only a shadow of its former self. To change the metophor, it is a legal ruin, not a safe warm house. Today, one can be forced to answer questions from the Department of Trade and Industry, or to disclose an alibi. What was said to someone other than a police officer or customs official is admissible in evidence against a person. What is said to a police officer until he has sufficient evidence of a prima facie case to caution someone is admissible. If a person says anything at all, he can be asked why he did not say something else. If a person does not give evidence, a judge can make hostile comments, by innuendo if not expressly.

The right to silence can even be a trap for the innocent on occasion. Intelligent jurors, whatever warning they may receive from a judge that it is a man's right to be silent, may naturally ask themselves why the man did not speak or explain himself. In our criminal cases, solicitors often assume that the men they are defending are guilty before having heard anything about the case, and will tell their clients to say nothing. They do so at the very moment when an explanation might have stopped the whole process of the prosecution or a criminal trial.

I am not one of those who pretend that the right to silence is a vital protector of the innocent, as has been claimed in a number of speeches today. That is going over the top, especially in the light of the danger that the right could be a snare for the innocent.

Why, then, should we not merely sweep it away? Because, for all its thinness and ruined state, the right to silence is still one of the significant linchpins of an accusatorial system and we should be cautious about abolishing it. Under this system the police make an accusation and have to prove it. They try their hardest to do so; sometimes they try too hard. Sometimes they are led to falsify, so the citizen must be protected.

Perhaps the time has come for us to consider more seriously the inquisitorial system that is used on the continent, in which the truth of whether the crime has been committed and of who committed it is investigated by a judicial figure. In such circumstances, the accused needs no right to silence because the police will be under less pressure to prove an allegation that may not have come from them in the first place. But while we still have the accusatorial system we should recognise that it is a delicate and timeworn structure that should not be tinkered with without the most careful, cautious and clear consideration.

My second objection is that this measure does not accord with any of these criteria. The Secretary of State gave us a clear sign of the danger of what is being asked of us when he was asked what caution should be given in these four situations. What warning should be given to protect the innocent man and enable him to understand fully the consequences of not speaking? My right hon. Friend could not answer. He said that this had been debated for a long time in the country. If that were so, I should have thought that some conclusion would have been arrived at. Where is it? What is it? My right hon. Friend could not answer.

It has not been fully considered. We are rushing through an ill-considered measure. My right hon. Friend said that the courts would decide. Why should the courts decide what it is our job to decide? Why should we write a blank cheque against the liberty of the individual, cross our fingers and hope that some court will write the law that it is Parliament's job to write? We are democratically elected to write the law, and the judges are there to interpret it. It is not their job to write it. It is wrong of my right hon. Friend to say that the courts will decide the caution.

The measure contains other signs of haste and lack of thought. Following his statement that nothing in the order would oblige an accused person to speak—it contains no provisions for thumb screws or racks, which is good of my right hon. Friend—he said that no guilt was to be presumed from his silence. He said that a man's silence would not advance the case against him. That is untrue. If inferences can be drawn against a suspect from his silence, the case is advanced against him, however rare and carefully defined these occasions are. In some instances the case against an accused will be advanced. The order cannot mean anything else, or there would be no point in bringing it before us.

My third objection is that the legal profession will be overwhelmingly against the change. We do not necessarily have to accept what the legal profession says. We can overrule it, but the profession will add its reasons for opposing the order to those that have been heard in the debate tonight. As the criminal law is administered by lawyers—prosecutors, defenders and judges—should not their opinions be seriously considered and their objections weighed in the balance?

Mr. Budgen: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that, if we had followed the proper Bill procedure the legal profession would have been able to offer its opinion of the various safeguards? When the legislation finally became an Act, the profession would then be satisfied that it had played its proper part in contributing to the discussion, instead of which the Secretary of State tells us that he does not understand the legal technicalities. He will leave them to other experts, and we must approve or disapprove on the nod.

Mr. Lawrence: Not only that, but such a Bill could have been subject to the Special Standing Committee procedure. The experts could have come along and given evidence under the procedure which the House introduced for just such occasions—occasions when changes touching the liberty of the individual can be carefully and maturely considered across party lines.

My fourth objection is that I do not see how the measure will lead to the conviction of more who are guilty of terrorism or any other crime, and I have already given my reasons for that conclusion.

All the protections that my right hon. Friend has introduced may be irrelevant in practice if there is no absolute right to silence at a trial. Solicitors can already be excluded and prevented from advising their clients by the police. It happens all the time in serious cases under present law, even after the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. Can there be any real confidence that the other procedures offer protection? And when a solicitor has been excluded, how often is a jury persuaded that the alleged words which constitute the only evidence against an accused have in truth been said? That is one of the reasons why, in cases in which the only evidence is an alleged admission of guilt, juries will not convict at the Central Criminal Court, or, for all I know, in courts all over the land.

This is a serious area of the law into which it is undesirable to blunder while the eyes have been blinded by the horror of terrorism and by the frustration of its continuance. My right hon. Friend needs to be cautious. He should not do in Northern Ireland what he would not do in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Yet my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has laid an order for England and Wales along similar lines. So tonight's measure is not just the thin end of the wedge. It will be the whole wedge, which is also to be driven home without consideration under the full Bill procedure in due course. If my right hon. Friends have no conviction that those measures would survive the proper procedures for changing the fundamental protections offered by our laws, they cannot count on my support, this time or next.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): Much has been eloquently said by right hon. and hon. and learned Members about the legality of this order, and it would be wrong of me, as a lay person, to attempt to deal with that aspect. Like the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, I shall ignore the legalities of this measure and deal instead with Northern Ireland's political realities.

The fundamental flaw that is to be found in this order is not the way in which it has been introduced—although, as a Northern Ireland Member of Parliament, I should certainly like more time to consider it. The flaw is that it is based on the great lie that underlines the Government's whole approach to Northern Ireland—that one can make the law act in such a way that it becomes a weapon with which to defeat terrorism. That is not what the law is there for. The law is there for administering justice, not for fighting a war. The Prime Minister herself has said that she is fighting a war in Northern Ireland, and now she is attempting, through the Home Secretary and the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, to bend the law in such a way that it becomes an instrument of that war. That is to demean and to diminish the whole process of law.

Another lie underlying the Government's approach is that, if one bends the law to one's advantage, one will be better able to defeat terrorism. That lie must be nailed and challenged in this House. From the point of view of the lay person—from the worm's eye view—such a policy deprives the individual of his right to be deemed innocent until evidence is brought before the courts proving him guilty. It also takes away the individual's right not to incriminate himself. The way in which the order compromises the existing situation alone will create great difficulties in Northern Ireland. If such a change is playing with fire in an ordinary society, it will create a bush fire in a society such as Northern Ireland, given the strife, divisions and endemic violence there.

In 1981, the Royal Commission on criminal procedure identified the basic element in the right to silence as the suspect's vulnerability when questioned by police, which remains as valid today as it did then. The Committee for the Administration of Justice comments:

> "The proposals are likely to make what happens in the police station an even more vital determinant of guilt or innocence than at present, and without adequate control of police interrogation methods, this must be a matter of concern."

Removal of the right to silence would be another step towards guilt and innocence being determined not in open courts, not by the judges, but in the interrogation rooms of police stations.

That is of special relevance to Northern Ireland, for three reasons. First, in the investigation by Mr. Justice Bennett, a member of the British Bar, into the way in which the RUC interrogated suspects in Castlereagh and Gough barracks, he found that they used brutal methods to obtain confessions. That is a matter of record not by an Irish nationalist but by a British jurist. For that reason, we must be particularly careful.

Secondly, the same Government who are introducing this measure have already been found guilty by the European Court of Human Rights of inhuman and degrading treatment. Thirdly, the same courts that will be required to administer this order presided over the bizarre and grotesque supergrass trials that substantially eroded confidence in those courts in Northern Ireland. It is for those three reasons that we must oppose and question not only this order but the measure introduced last week and the measure that will, before the month is out, tamper with a free and open franchise. We must register our concern.

Why is this order needed? Is the existing law not adequate? Are not the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1974, the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978, the Public Order Act 1986, and the massive powers they give the security forces adequate? Is the measure permitting seven days' detention not sufficient? Is it not enough that people can be refused—as 52 per cent. of them are—access to legal advice for 48 hours, and that a police officer sits in on any consultation between the accused and his legal adviser? Or are people walking free from the courts who should be convicted because of the basic principle and tradition of a right to silence? If such is the suggestion, it must be challenged with the facts.

In the second quarter of this year, 94 per cent. of those charged in Northern Ireland were convicted. In case it should be thought that this is a vintage year, I can tell the House that in 1980, the figure was 94 per cent.; 1981, 93·9 per cent.; 1982, 93·8 per cent.; 1983, 90 per cent.; 1984, 91·4 per cent.; 1985, 90 per cent.; 1986, 95·4 per cent.; and 1987, 94·2 per cent. Is the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland still saying that Northern Ireland conviction rates merit this order's derogation from normal practice? It can be challenged on those grounds alone.

Mr. Kilfedder: The last figures I had for Northern Ireland convictions before the Diplock trials showed that they were no greater than in the rest of the United Kingdom. Perhaps there is some conflict between our two sets of figures. I would like to know.

Mr. Mallon: I am using the Government's own figures in relation to the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1978, which are a matter of record in the House and in the Official Report.

Are a large number of suspects remaining silent in Northern Ireland and avoiding conviction by doing so? The reality is that that is not the case, and that most convictions are secured as a result of statements by the accused; over the past year, 80 per cent. of suspects pleaded guilty.

I hope that I am not being too cynical in suggesting that this measure is another Government palliative designed to satisfy British public opinion, because the Government can say, "Look what we are doing to get to grips with this problem." Or perhaps it is another sop to Unionism. If it is either of those two things, it is a cynical approach and one that attacks the rights of the individual in attempting to solve a political problem that the Government have not yet properly grasped.

The legal profession is opposed to this measure. It is opposed to it in the North of Ireland. The Secretary of State already has the views about the lack of consultation of the Law Society, the Committee for the Administration of Justice and the Standing Advisory Committee on Human Rights. He has the views of the Criminal Bar Association and the National Council for Civil Liberties. But they are all out of step: the people who are right are those within the Cabinet. It is not the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, nor the Home Secretary, but the person or people within the Cabinet who are saying, "Let us try to solve the problem by punitive measures." They will not do it now or in the future.

Let me deal briefly with references that have been made to that which pertains in the Irish Republic. I oppose this measure in the Irish Republic, as I do here. The fact that it exists there does not make it right. It is wrong there for the same reasons that it is wrong here. However, there are four major differences there. First, it has never been invoked since it has been introduced in the Republic of Ireland. I do not know whether it is felt that it would not be right to invoke it or whether to do so would be counter-productive, but it never has. There is a right of appeal under the Irish constitution—an appeal which does not exist here, where there is no basic Bill of Human Rights to which to appeal. There is no restriction on access to solicitors, and the Garda involved must have a statutory duty to make information available if there is an investigation in relation to the interrogation of any citizen.

Many of us who are not members of the legal profession are sometimes bemused by the way in which the legal profession approaches things and would question the Government's attitude. Speaking at Cambridge university to the Tory Reform Group on 25 October, the Attorney-General said:

> "The problem with the practice of the right to silence is that guilty people go free because juries are unable to exercise their common sense."

We must weigh that against the opinion of Sir Rupert Cross, who, I am told, is the expert on this. He said:

> "One of the objects of the law of evidence is to prevent common sense from having a free rein because there are cases in which to permit it might lead to an unjust result."

We are asked here to balance the Attorney-General's opinion against that of Sir Rupert Cross.

The Attorney-General further makes the points that people should not be > "acquitted by what seems the eloquent exploitation of the rules of the game."

I know of no hon. Member who is better equipped to judge what constitutes exploiting the rules of the game than the Attorney-General, if we are to judge by his decision earlier this year in relation to people who have broken the law. That is one of the problems that faces the layman, and it is a matter on which the Secretary of State should think again.

6.32 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Listening to the debate, one might be forgiven for wondering whether many hon. Members have read the order. There is no provision in the order forcing a person to give evidence. Article 2(4) says:

> "A person shall not be committed for trial, have a case to answer or be convicted of an offence solely on an inference drawn from such a failure or refusal as is mentioned in Article 3(2), 4(4), 5(2) or 6(2)."

Many of the speeches that we have heard from the Opposition, referring to the fifth amendments, thumb-screws and other matters are a load of hot air. It has always been established—I can quote references if I have to—that a trial judge can comment on the fact that the accused has decided not to give evidence. There is nothing in the order to require an accused to give evidence.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) said, in refusing to give way to me, that no real comparison could be made between the position in Southern Ireland and the United Kingdom on a matter of this kind. The plain fact is that the Republic has sections 18 and 19 of the Criminal Justice Act 1984. It may be that for a variety of reasons the judges have decided not to invoke it, but the reality is that the Republic has passed that legislation. It is perfectly compatible that we should pass similar legislation, particularly having regard to the determined way in which terrorists on both sides of the argument are deliberately determined not to make any statements, so as to ensure that no justice is carried out under which they may be convicted.

Mr. Lawrence: Why does my hon. Friend say that, if a man is told that he ought to say something and that, if he fails to do so, such inferences will be drawn against him as may be proper, that is not an obligation upon him to speak?

Mr. Cash: My hon. and learned Friend, for whom I have the greatest possible respect, has not read the order. The point is that each of these important provisions says that the accused, after he has been called upon by the court, is merely put in that position if he chooses to exercise his right to silence. The crucial word then is "may": the court or jury may draw the inference. In other words, there is no compulsion to do so. Therefore, he preserves his right to silence on the one hand and the court is merely empowered—permitted—to draw an inference which, as I have already said, is a principle already entrenched in case law.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): The hon. Gentleman cannot believe that.

Mr. Cash: I am simply looking at what the order states, and it is on that basis that I conclude my argument.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): I apologise to the House for not being present throughout the debate, but let me briefly say something about the right of silence, which was introduced into all European systems of law following the Spanish inquisition. It was equally required because, until, I think, 1898 in England and 1892 in Scotland, an accused was not allowed to give evidence, so anything that he did say, whether under torture or not, could not be corrected, explained, denied or added to. Once the accused was entitled to give evidence, the right to silence became absurd.

The right to silence has never been part of the law of Scotland, in that, until 1923, all persons accused were immediately brought before a magistrate so that they could explain their position. Therefore, the innocent confirmed that their story was consistent from the beginning and the guilty were unable to make up a false defence once they knew what the evidence was. That was reintroduced in the Criminal Justice (Scotland) Act in 1980, under my guidance. It is important that nobody accused should be able to hide behind a barrier when, after all, if he is to be convicted, the idiot witness is not allowed the right of silence. However stupid he is, he will be convicted on the compulsive say-so of the witness. Therefore, we should be cautious about the emotion of the right to silence.

However, I caution my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. To introduce by order as emotive and structural a matter as this is imagined to be by the law of England is a questionable constitutional change. Section 10 of the Bill of Rights of 1891 in the United States, where the concept of the right to silence is supposedly enshrined in the fifth amendment, says that no man shall be compelled to give evidence against himself. That is purely a protection against torture. If one is to have verbals, the right to silence is no protection against anything. Therefore, it is important that we should clarify in our minds the fact that for the accused to make his position clear at the earliest possible moment is in his interest and in the interests of justice. To do it before a magistrate and not in the secrecy of a police station ensures that what he says is there for all to see.

Since that has been the law of Scotland, which is supposed to be the civilised part of the civilian tradition, the Roman tradition of Europe, I see no reason why the law of England should not at last be brought up to date, and with great respect to those in Northern Ireland, I do not know why they are worried.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): The order has been described as constitutionally outrageous, and that is not an exaggeration. We have an order instead of a Bill and we have been allowed about an hour and a quarter of Back-Bench contributions. Apart from the Government Front Bench, barely a good word has been said about the order by any hon. Member from either side of the House.

The order is being applied not only to terrorist offences. It changes the law fundamentally as it applies to a harassed housewife who may be accused of a shoplifting offence or to someone who may be accused of careless driving. It applies throughout the range of crimes. It is a matter not simply of emergency or terrorism; it is a very broad change which we are urged to agree after only two or three hours of debate.

The Secretary of State said that it had been discussed exhaustively. I do not think that that is true. That certainly was not the view of the Law Society of Northern Ireland in its press release which protested that it "had not been consulted about a change in the law of 'such a fundamental nature'."

It is true that the Criminal Law Revision Committee in 1972 recommended a change in the rules. There was plenty of debate about that recommendation, and the preponderance of the views expressed about the recommendation of that committee was rejection. The conclusions of that committee certainly were rejected by a Conservative Government between 1972 and 1974, and they were not implemented by the Labour Government between 1974 and 1979. There was another opportunity in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1983, but they were rejected there.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Fraser: I must keep my remarks short. I gave up time for others, and it is only fair that I should not be interrupted.

In the current legislative year, there was an opportunity to change the law in the Criminal Justice Act 1988, yet here we have an order which is a constitutional outrage. An announcement made in the last 10 days of October is to become the law of the land in Northern Ireland on 8 November. That must be a constitutional outrage, particularly in view of the very limited time that hon. Members have had to discuss it.

The Secretary of State said that it is a modest change. It is not a modest change. It changes the burden of proof in criminal proceedings. Of course, there are isolated exceptions, but it means that the silence of a defendant is to be taken as corroboration of the evidence which is presented by the prosecution. That is a fundamental change in the nature of the law of evidence that has existed in this country for hundreds of years.

Of course, there are occasions when we have made absolute offences which apply to small things such as watering milk and the breathalyser test. However, in other cases, very sensibly, we have looked at circumscribing the right of the defence to ambush the prosecution, and we introduced the notice of alibi. If the Government were bringing forward a considered arrangement for giving notice of defences which ambush the prosecution, that might be a reasonable way of approaching the matter. Instead, within a matter of two and a half hours, they propose fundamentally changing law which has existed for hundreds of years.

The Secretary of State complained that 50 per cent. of those accused in Northern Ireland refuse to answer questions. He is really saying that that 50 per cent. of accused people ought to be playing a part in convicting themselves. He is saying that the combination of an accusation and some evidence allied to the exercise of the right to silence leads to a greater degree of conviction. That must be self-incrimination, which is a very fundamental change. It is not a modest change, as the Secretary of State suggested. It runs counter to the rights which were transplanted from England to the United States and developed in the American constitution. I am sure that the Secretary of State should be aware of the dangers to his own policy of providing a new grievance which can be developed in the United States.

The measure is introduced in Northern Ireland in circumstances where there is less protection than in England. I instance four. First, there are occasions in Northern Ireland—I am told by my hon. Friend the Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon) that it involves about half the cases—when the accused is refused access to a lawyer in the first 48 hours; therefore, there is less protection there for a person who wishes to exercise the right of silence.

Secondly, in Northern Ireland there is no duty solicitor scheme such as operates under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act in England where a duty solicitor is available at all hours of the day and night to assist when somebody is accused and held for questioning at a police station. That protection is absent in Northern Ireland.

Thirdly, the Secretary of State does not even know what kind of caution will be used. Article 3 of the order contains no words to imply that a caution ought to be given at all. It says that somebody is to be "officially informed that he might be prosecuted", although in later articles it states that he has to be told in "ordinary language", which is what is meant by a caution. It seems grossly unsatisfactory to make such a fundamental change in the law of evidence and for the Secretary of State not even to be aware of the caution that is to be administered.

Lastly, there is the weakness of the absence of jury trial in Northern Ireland. We can all understand the reasons for having Diplock courts, but there is the final absence of the protection of the scepticism of 12 citizens who may be much more willing to question the way in which statements have been taken and admissions made than would a judge sitting alone.

I have very little time, but I wish to make one detailed criticism of the order. If we were in Committee, we could spend several mornings considering the detail of the order. I have only two minutes to consider some of the detail that I shall draw to the attention of the House. Article 3 does not say that the defendant must actually be accused of a crime.

Article 3(1)(a) states that at any time when somebody is "being questioned by a constable trying to discover whether or by whom the offence had been committed"— if he—

"failed to mention any fact relied on in his defence,"

an inference can be drawn from that failure later in proceedings. From the wording of article 3, it is clear that a person can be questioned about the suspicion of somebody else having committed a crime, yet, because he fails to mention a salient fact during his questioning about somebody else having committed a crime, that can be held against him in his trial.

Taking some words from article 3(1)(b)—they are not out of context—if the accused, on being "officially informed that he might be prosecuted, failed to mention any such fact," inferences could be drawn. As an illustration, if somebody is told that he might be prosecuted for careless driving and he shrugs his shoulders—as most of us would in the circumstances—and hopes that nothing will happen, the fact that he shrugged his shoulders and then introduced a defence means that an inference may be drawn against him and he could well be convicted by the shrug of his shoulders. But for the grace of God, anybody could be convicted in such circumstances. If a store detective says to a housewife, "You may be prosecuted for taking these goods out of the shop," the order applies equally as it does to the terrorist.

We are not debating a special arrangement for terrorist offences. I do not doubt that the abolition of the right to silence will lead to more convictions. I do not doubt that the abolition of the right to silence will enable some guilty people who now go free to be convicted. But some innocent people who now go free will also be convicted. One of the planks of our constitution is that it is better that 10 guilty men go free than that one innocent man is convicted. That plank is being removed in a telescoped debate without proper consideration. That is not the way to defeat terrorism. It is the way to give terrorists new friends, new alibis, and new grievances. The order should be rejected by the House.

6.50 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): In the short time available, I shall seek to answer some of the points raised in the debate and to correct some of the deeply misplaced and, at times, hysterical criticisms that have been made, particularly by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) and, I am sorry to say, the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan).

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) asked whether, under article 3, someone who brought forward for the first time at trial some facts or explanation which he might have been expected to produce earlier could be convicted on that alone. It is important for the House to know that, under article 2(4) of the order,

"A person shall not be committed for trial, have a case to answer or be convicted of an offence solely on an inference drawn from such a failure or refusal as is mentioned" in the articles referred to.

My hon. Friends have raised the question of the caution. As they will know, the matter of the caution, until the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and the codes of practice, was always a matter for the judges. The Lord Chief Justice and the judiciary of Northern Ireland are considering, at the request of the Government, the appropriate procedures that will have to be followed by the police when questioning suspects if Parliament approves the order.

That advice will be issued to the Royal Ulster Constabulary as an amended version of the present judge's rules, which apply in Northern Ireland, or as administrative guidance to the police pending replacement of the judge's rules by a code of practice under the provisions of the forthcoming police and criminal evidence order, which is being laid and is currently in draft for consultation in Northern Ireland. There will be an opportunity for the House to scrutinise it in the context of that procedure.

The hon. Members for Kingston upon Hull, North and for Sheffield, Attercliffe (Mr. Duffy) mentioned tape recording. The reasons why the tape recording of suspects in terrorist cases cannot be made known to the outside world must be clear to anyone who considers the matter. The House should remember that there is the safeguard that all interrogation of terrorist suspects in Northern Ireland is carried out in one of three holding centres under closed circuit television surveillance by uniformed police officers. That safeguard applies to every such suspect.

Mr. McNamara: Closed circuit television surveillance does not alter the fact that the contents of the tape recordings are not known.

The Solicitor-General: I will leave the hon. Gentleman to ponder his own question.

The right to a solicitor was raised by the hon. Member for Newry and Armagh (Mr. Mallon). Under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1987, any terrorist suspect has the right to a solicitor. In 1987, 212 were given immediate access to a solicitor. For reasons set out in the Act, which will be well understood by the hon. Gentleman, there are reasons why in some terrorist cases there may be a delay. However, 264 were given access in periods up to 48 hours and after 48 hours everyone had the right of access to a solicitor.

Some hon. Members have sought to argue that this is a hasty measure, which is not carefully considered and is some sort of knee-jerk reaction to terrorism. That is not so. The order is part of a reaction to serious crime generally —I am grateful to the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) for recognising that—in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. Conditions have changed since the Royal Commission, which was set up in 1978 and reported in 1981, and present-day experience in England, Wales and the Province appears to be significantly different from what the Royal Commission found.

My hon. Friends will remember that the debate stems from long before the work of the Royal Commission. The Criminal Law Revision Committee made its 11th report in June 1972. Members of that Committee were respected figures. I was astonished to hear the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North saying that nobody who supported the order could believe in the liberty of the citizen. When one considers that the members of the CLRC were led by judges of immense experience, headed by Lord Justice Edmund-Davies and many other distinguished judges, those remarks seem deeply out of place.

The hon. Member for Newry and Armagh, whom I deeply respect, contrasted my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General with Professor Rupert Cross. He said that he would prefer his opinion to that of my right hon. and learned Friend. Professor Rupert Cross was a member of the CLRC which unanimously advocated this provision and in all his books he has constantly argued for it in the most persuasive way.

Mr. Lawrence rose——

The Solicitor-General: The conclusions of the Royal Commission, based on the evidence then available to it, seem somewhat surprising now. Paragraph 4.46 of the report says:

"to summarise the research indicates that the privilege not to incriminate oneself is not used by suspects in the great majority of cases and keeping silent altogether is said to be very rare."

It found that the right of silence was not at that time a right that the generality of suspects chose to exercise.

The conclusions were based on fairly limited research by Mr. Paul Softley in only four police stations. It suggested that only 4 per cent. of those interviewed failed to answer at all and only 8 per cent. failed to answer some questions. I invite the House to compare that with what is now known from experience in serious criminal matters in England and Wales and from statistical evidence in relation to suspected terrorists in Northern Ireland. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State told the House, nearly half of all suspected terrorists fail to answer any question of substance. I hope that the House will begin to see why men of good will support the order and why learned judges and jurists throughout the country believe that it is high time that we introduced a measure of this sort.

I shall seek to allay one other misconception. Several hon. Members, in today's debate and in public comments, appear to believe that the changes proposed involve a shift in the burden of proof from prosecution to defence. That is a complete misunderstanding. The prosecution will continue to have to prove its case according to the same high standard, which is that the court and jury should be sure beyond reasonable doubt of a defendant's guilt. The case must be proved by evidence. Mere silence in the face of accusation will never be enough. That is made expressly clear in article 2(4), to which I referred earlier.

The changes allow the court or jury, applying their common sense, to draw whatever inference seems appropriate from the silence of the accused and to consider in doing so the comments of the prosecution and the judge. Sometimes an adverse inference would be wholly inappropriate. The judge may be expected to draw that to the jury's attention. On other occasions, the failure to put forward an innocent explanation may cry out for clarification. To deny the jury the right to hear the comments of the prosecution, the defence and the judge on that failure and to ponder its significance before making up their minds is to introduce an artificial restraint, which is no safeguard to the innocent and provides unnecessary advantage to the guilty.

The measures proposed in the draft order are founded in common sense. They will restore some of the balance of fairness between prosecution and defence. They will increase the likelihood that justice will prevail in our courts and, by doing so, they will make the path of serious crime more hazardous for those striving to undermine the rule of law.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 20th October 1988, be approved.

Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill

7.13 pm

Motion made, and Question proposed:

That the Promoters of the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill shall have leave to suspend proceedings thereon in order to proceed with the Bill, if they think fit, in the next Session of Parliament, provided that the Agents for the Bill give notice to the Clerks in the Private Bill Office not later than the day before the close of the present Session of their intention to suspend further proceedings and that all Fees due on the Bill up to that date be paid;

That on the fifth day on which the House sits in the next Session the Bill shall be presented to the House;

That there shall be deposited with the Bill a declaration signed by the Agents for the Bill, stating that the Bill is the same, in every respect, as the Bill at the last stage of its proceedings in this House in the present Session;

That the Bill shall be laid upon the Table of the House by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office on the next meeting of the House after the day on which the Bill has been presented and, when so laid, shall be read the first and second time and committed (and shall be recorded in the Journal of this House as having been so read and committed);

That all Petitions relating to the Bill presented in the present Session which stand referred to the Committee on the Bill, together with any minutes of evidence taken before the Committee on the Bill, shall stand referred to the Committee on the Bill in the next Session;

That no Petitioners shall be heard before the Committee on the Bill, unless their Petition has been presented within the time limited within the present Session or deposited pursuant to paragraph (b) of Standing Order 126 relating to Private Business;

That in relation to the Bill, Standing Order 127 relating to Private business shall have effect as if the words "under Standing Order 126 (Reference to committee of petitions against Bill)" were omitted;

That no further Fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which Fees have already been incurred during the present Session;

That these Orders be Standing Orders of the House.—[The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to discuss also the motion relating to the North Killingholme Cargo Terminal Bill:

That the Promoters of the North Killingholme Cargo Terminal Bill shall have leave to suspend proceedings thereon in order to proceed with the Bill, if they think fit, in the next Session of Parliament, provided that the Agents for the Bill give notice to the Clerks in the Private Bill Office not later than the day before the close of the present Session of their intention to suspend further proceedings and that all Fees due on the Bill up to that date be paid;

That on the fifth day on which the House sits in the next Session the Bill shall be presented to the House;

That there shall be deposited with the Bill a declaration signed by the Agents for the Bill, stating that the Bill is the same, in every respect, as the Bill at the last stage of its proceedings in this House in the present Session;

That the Bill shall be laid upon the Table of the House by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office on the next meeting of the House after the day on which the Bill has been presented and, when so laid, shall be read the first and second time and committed (and shall be recorded in the Journal of this House as having been so read and committed);

That all Petitions relating to the Bill presented in the present Session which stand referred to the Committee on the Bill, together with any minutes of evidence taken before the Committee on the Bill, shall stand referred to the Committee on the Bill in the next Session;

That no Petitioners shall be heard before the Committee on the Bill, unless their Petition has been presented within the time limited within the present Session or deposited pursuant to paragraph (b) of Standing Order 126 relating to Private Business;

That in relation to the Bill, Standing Order 127 relating to Private Business shall have effect as if the words "under Standing Order 126 (Reference to committee of petitions against Bills)" were omitted;

That no further Fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which Fees have already been incurred during the present Session;

That these Orders be Standing Orders of the House.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will recall that when the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) originally introduced the two Bills, I asked whether they were hybrid Bills. You rightly said that the Examiner had examined the Bills and said that they were in order. We had several discussions with the Examiner, but unfortunately the holder of the office is not the person who originally approved the Bills. We found the present Examiner perfectly acceptable and most helpful in the guidance and assistance that he gave us.

My point of order is this. While it is not your concern that the Government have put a two-line Whip on these two Bills, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that action, coupled with their past practice when these Bills have been discussed on the Floor of the House, and with what happened when they were originally moved, shows that the Government are deeply involved. Therefore, I ask you to rule that the Bills are hybrid.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Member is right: when the Bills were originally introduced, he raised the question of the possibility, as he saw it, of hybridity arising, and on that occasion I sought guidance and was assured, as the hon. Gentleman recognises, that the Bills were not hybrid. The way that Bills are whipped is not a matter for me, as the hon. Gentleman also recognises, but if, hypothetically, the Government were to favour a particular Bill, that of itself would not make it hybrid. Hybridity is a question of the inherent qualities of the Bill, and that point does not arise.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. On 22 July, as reported in Hansard, at column 1175, I questioned whether the Bills were private, because there had been a meeting between the outside promoters of the Bill and the then Secretary of State for Transport. You will recall, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that you gave your ruling on that and we were satisfied that, given that the Bill concerns the Secretary of State for Transport, there was nothing wrong with that meeting taking place.

However, it has come to my notice that, since then, the promoters of one of the Bills has met not only the Secretary of State for Transport but the Secretary of State for Energy and I can assume that at that meeting there was some discussion about the moving of bulk cargoes of interest to that portfolio through this port. I assume that there has been no meeting with the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, to discuss the sugarbeet and other agricultural produce that will go through the port, and no meeting with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to discuss the iron ore and other forms of steel getting through the plant.

In those circumstances, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will you look differently at the judgment you gave earlier about whether these are private or public Bills? The Departments closely connected with them seem to be running the passage of the Bills through the House, although they are supposed to be private Bills. Could you give us another ruling on this?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is high time that we managed to sort out when a private Bill is a public Bill, a Government Bill or a hybrid Bill. We are fast reaching the point when Ministers not only meet those representing South African interests on behalf of the promoters of the Bill but they put on two-line Whips to get the troops here. We know that, on the last occasion, the Prime Minister herself, although she says that she is against apartheid, trotted through the Lobby in her carpet slippers and voted for the Bill.

All those ingredients added together show that it is high time that that the Chair, in this case the Chairman of Ways and Means, should start to come to the conclusion, as many on this side of the House and the country have, that this is not a private Bill. It is an abuse of parliamentary procedure and when there is an abuse of parliamentary procedure, it reflects not only on those involved in this corrupt procedure but on the Chair. It is high time that Bills of this nature were ruled out of order. Let us get on with the next business.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I should deal first with the point raised by the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron). It appears that his recollection of a ruling that I made on a previous occasion was correct. It appeared to me quite sensible advice to give on that occasion. I shall not repeat it now, except to say that I do not think there has been any impropriety. Obviously, I do not know, nor is it a matter of concern to me, whom Ministers meet to discuss matters that come before the House, but I do not detect any impropriety.

Let me deal with the matters raised by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). I understand the concern that has been expressed several times about the private Bill procedure in the House. He will know that, in response to that concern, I took the initiative to establish a Joint Committee which has laboured long and hard. I must take this opportunity to express my appreciation of its hard work in producing a report.

After those people who are most directly affected by the report, and others, have had an opportunity to look at its recommendations and express their views, I very much hope that the House will be able to take those views into account in making its recommendations in the fullness of time. The hon. Member for Bolsover will no doubt want to take part in that debate, and I shall certainly bear him in mind.

Mr. Barron Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I do not wish to disagree with your ruling, but would it be possible for the Secretary of State for Energy to be brought to the House to explain what took place at the meeting with the promoters of the Bill?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think that that is a matter for me, and I am sure that the House will recognise that.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are all aware of and very much welcome your initiative in encouraging the House of Commons and the House of Lords to set up a Joint Committee. We welcome the unanimous recommendations of that Committee.

One of the matters that concerns many of my right hon. and hon. Friends is that, if the Committee's unanimous recommendations were adopted by the House, this sort of Bill would not be able to get through. If the carry-over motion were not passed, these Bills would have to start all over again and the rules of the House would probably have changed to make sure that that could not be done. We are concerned that, by passing these carry-over motions or even by contemplating carrying over these Bills, we would be foreclosing on the likely decision of the House that such Bills should not be contemplated in future. We think that that is a point of order and we would like your ruling on it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I doubt whether the points that have been put to me are matters of order or matters for the Chair. They might be taken into account by the House in the ensuing debate. What might be the view of the House on the procedure is in the realm of hypothesis and the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) would not expect me to speculate on what might be the view of the House in the event of the Joint Committee report being debated and decisions being reached by the House. Along with many of the other points that have been made, these are matters that the House might take into account in reaching its conclusions when the Question is finally put from the Chair.

Mr. Michael Brown (Brigg and Cleethorpes): I wish to support the motions to carry over into the next Session the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill and the North Killingholme Cargo Terminal Bill. The House will recall that we have had several debates on these Bills. We spent about five hours on the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill when we considered it on Second Reading before the summer recess, and we spent almost six hours on the other Bill. After much debate and passion, the House concluded that both Bills should be given a Second Reading. Those Bills are now being considered in Committee under the private Bill Committee procedure.

I and a number of other hon. Members have attended most of the sessions, sitting in the public gallery. We all agree that progress is being made. Petitions with legitimate concerns and fears may present their case to Committee members. All hon. Members who have seen the four hon. Members concerned working during the past three weeks accept that they have been doing a marvellous job, giving petitioners every opportunity to examine and cross-examine. Associated British Ports has now concluded its case as a promoter of the Bill. It has been examined and cross-examined fiercely and effectively by those who have petitioned against the Bill. During the past week, the promoters of the North Killingholme Cargo Terminal Bill have been putting their case and their witnesses have been examined and cross-examined. There will be an important opportunity for those opposed to the Bill to present their case.

The House has resolved that the Committee is the place for these Bills to be judged. Witnesses can be called by both sides and those four hon. Members can act in a judicial capacity, looking dispassionately at the evidence before them, and conclude what recommendation to put before the House. It would be a great waste of time, particularly for the petitioners and the promoters, who have been working assiduously in that Committee, if they found that they were unable to proceed in presenting their cases. For those reasons, it is essential that the Committee should be able to do its job properly.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): The hon. Gentleman says that it would be a great waste of time if the Committee's work were made pointless by the decision that I and many of my hon. Friends hope will be made later tonight. However, is he not saying that the Joint Committee, which has considered the private Bill procedure, has engaged in a great waste of time, if the Bill proceeds as he proposes?

Mr. Brown: I do not agree with that analysis. I wish to echo your words of tribute, Mr. Deputy Speaker to those Members of both Houses who have presented a report with which I have a great deal of sympathy. I hope that we can have an early debate on that report.

The promoters of both Bills are sympathetic to the content of that report. For example, if I am not mistaken, the recommendation regarding carry-over motions suggests that, when private Bills have been brought before the House and given a Second Reading, we should not have to go through this kind of debate and that there should be no need for a carry-over motion. I suggest that the hon. Gentleman reads that part of the report. These two Bills, which have been before the House for the past six months, have brought into sharp focus the need for a re-examination of the private Bill procedure.

The House has spent a great deal of time considering whether the Bills should be given a Second Reading. They have been given a Second Reading and they are now in Committee. The petitioners are doing a first-rate job in assimilating the evidence that they require to present to the Committee. The promoters are also doing their job. It is right and proper to allow those four hon. Members who have spent so much time on the thankless task of serving on a private Bill Committee to continue their work. It would not be right and proper for us to intervene in that work; I very much commend the carry-over motions.

7.30 pm

Mr. Lawrence Cunliffe (Leigh): I do not question your judgments, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on the various points of order that were raised before the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) addressed the House. I know that you sympathise with some of the sentiments which were expressed against the background of personal, industrial and social objectives.

I believe that the Bill should be opposed at all stages. I am not satisfied that it is genuine private business. Most of the Bill's provisions relate to commercial enterprise, and the machinery of Parliament has been used to serve the interests of Associated British Ports. If the Bill is enacted, various strategic elements of the British economy will be adversely affected. It is inevitable that miners, transport workers, dockers and others who work in industries associated with the ports will be adversely affected. It could be said that no one group of workers will be unaffected. The Bill embraces almost every element of our industrial society.

The House will be aware that Lord Marshall said that, on the basis of privatisation, he would be prepared to take in 30 million tonnes of imported coal. Associated British Ports cannot say how much coal its terminal will be able to import. It must, however, have engaged in market research. It will have examined its investment policy and considered cash-flow liquidity. It is clear to everyone that it is a long-term investment that is bound to yield substantial profits. Profit is the motive behind the exercise, and it will be enhanced by Government collusion. If the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State participate in voting during the passage of a private Member's Bill, we must instinctively conclude that it represents part of their philosophy. It would be nonsense to deny that.

In talking about the importation of 30 million tonnes of coal, we are talking also of the livelihoods of 47,000 miners and 7,000 or 8,000 employees in complementary industries. It costs £24,700 to make a Yorkshire miner redundant, and the bill would be about £1·16 billion if 30 million tonnes of coal were imported. That would be a waste of human resources. Valuable manpower would be thrown on the scrap heap at great expense to the nation.

A parliamentary group visited South Africa to examine its coal mining industry. It was said that the aim of the February visit was to provide the delegation with a comprehensive insight of all issues related to the South African coal industry. The ultimate motive was thereafter about 47,000 mineworkers and 8,000 others as a result of sanctions, being introduced, in effect, against the coal industry. Those workers will suffer if we do not take action against South African imports. It is ironic that parliamentarians should seek to promote activities with South Africa when other civilised nations, including the United States, are breaking their links with that country. Association with South Africa is not welcomed by most democratic nations.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): Does my hon. Friend appreciate that the cost of the rundown of manpower throughout the nation, to which he has referred, could be £559 million?

Mr. Cunliffe: I agree with my hon. Friend. I accept that figure.

The Opposition are attempting to protect and promote British interests. That has been our approach throughout. I accept that the ports are sited strategically and that coal is not the only consideration. I welcome any expansion of the ports and the economy in and around them. I am merely arguing that there should be some protection. By and large, Britain clings to the Queensberry rules, while other countries are subsidising their industries to the hilt, including the coal and steel industries. We are receiving their exports while it is argued that free marketers should be able to do exactly what they want within the market mechanism.

My colleagues and I are opposed to the procedural device that is before us. We shall take every opportunity to oppose unbounded commercialism in our effort to protect the British people.

7.38 pm

Mr. Henry Bellingham (Norfolk, North-West): I shall confine my remarks to the part of the Bill that is relevant to my constituency, including the port of King's Lynn. The provisions that relate to King's Lynn docks are entirely uncontroversial, much needed and welcomed, but perhaps it would have been better if they did not appear in the Bill. I have some sympathy with the views that have been expressed by the hon. Member for Leigh (Mr. Cunliffe) and some of his colleagues as well as the views of some of my colleagues. Having said that, I hope that they understand the position in which I find myself. The part of the Bill that affects my constituency will have a crucial effect on the docks and the local economy in future.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Bill should be split into three separate measures: the first confined to the King's Lynn terminal, the second to the Port Talbot terminal and the third to the terminal on the Humber? In that way there would be less opposition on the Opposition Benches to the provisions that attach to the King's Lynn facilities.

Mr. Bellingham: The hon. Gentleman has made a good point. It is all very well being wise after the event; but, if the Bill falls, the works in both King's Lynn and Port Talbot will fall as well. That is why I must press for the carry-over motion.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): An opportunity has been presented for us to rethink. Rather than being tied to a Bill containing three elements, if we do not carry it over we shall be able to introduce three separate measures in the next session.

Mr. Bellingham: It is all very well for the hon. Gentleman to say that, but King's Lynn wants to get on with the work. It wants to put the business out to tender and start as soon as possible.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman, who clearly faces a dilemma. His sympathies seem to lie with my hon. Friends from the coal mining industry rather than with his hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown). I assure him that if he opposed the carry-over motion, unlinked legislation affecting King's Lynn and Port Talbot could be introduced in January next year and it would receive no opposition from Labour Members. He would have his Bill much more quickly on that basis.

Mr. Bellingham: I am grateful for what the hon. Gentleman has said, but he was putting words into my mouth when he claimed that I was supporting Opposition Members. That is not strictly true. I said that I had some sympathy with the arguments adduced by the hon. Member for Leigh and others, but I also have considerable sympathy with my hon. Friends who are concerned about their local economies and are keen to promote business and expansion in their constituencies.

My hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) made some powerful points about why the carry-over should go ahead. The Committee on the Bill has been deliberating for some time, and if the motion were not passed much time and effort would be wasted. I should also like Opposition Members to understand what is happening in King's Lynn. It was once one of the country's busiest ports, ranked third in the national league. After many decades of decline in this century, it has now recorded a dramatic revival based on timber, grain and bulk commodities. It imports cars, tractors and motor bikes, and I am pleased to say that the export side is building up considerably as well.

In 1987 King's Lynn docks handled 1·5 million tonnes, and it is on target for a repeat performance this year. There are, however, numerous shortcomings. As I said when we were discussing the same measure about three months ago, the docks are tidal; they are also enclosed. They are restricted to vessels of about 3,000 dead weight tonnes, 13·8 m in width and 120 m in length. A riverside quay is desperately needed. The works allowed for in the Bill would mean that the maximum would rise to 6,000 dead-weight tonnes, and the average would be about 4,500 tonnes. The maximum length of vessels would be 140 m and the maximum width 18 m. That would make a dramatic difference to the type of vessel able to enter King's Lynn docks, which in turn would have a considerable effect on the tonnage going through the docks and on the importance of the port. The docks would be revolutionised and their future guaranteed. If the Bill does not go through existing competition from non-scheme ports will intensify.

It is ironic that Opposition supporters of the national dock labour scheme, are, by that support, making life difficult for ports such as King's Lynn. A group of non-scheme ports that have set up in East Anglia are able to compete in a number of ways, and that is putting considerable pressure on King's Lynn. If Opposition Members deny King's Lynn its expansion, I must consider the effects on my constituency, although I am mindful of the helpful comment made by the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd).

I should not be doing my duty if I did not vote for the motion. The local economy has gone from strength to strength: unemployment has fallen from 18 per cent. to 6·5 per cent., small firms are booming, and a whole new enterprise culture is afoot. The roads are improving and we are campaigning hard for railway electrification. Underpinning all that, however, is the success of the docks. If they are not allowed to thrive, expand and compete with non-scheme ports, that success story will be jeopardised. It would indeed be a tragedy if the motion were not passed.

Finally, let me pick up a point made by the hon. Member for Leigh. While I sympathise with his views on apartheid, I cannot agree with his views on sanctions. I recently went down Douglas and Ritspruit mines in South Africa and had a chance to talk to representatives of the South African mineworkers' union. They said that if comprehensive coal sanctions were applied, the black miners, not the white owners, would suffer most. Clearly there is a wish to do something about apartheid, but sanctions would lead to appalling misery.

I must support the motion, because, if it does not go through, there will be serious consequences for my constituency and its future.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) has been shedding crocodile tears about black people in South Africa. I suppose that he will make representations to all his friends with interests connected with South Africa and tell them to pay black workers decent wages—the same rates as are paid to whites. I wonder whether he did that when he went trotting off to South Africa, paid for by the South Africans.

It is interesting to note that the first two Conservative speakers have both come hotfoot from South Africa and that their visits were paid for. God knows how many more have done the same. I suppose that there are South African interests in the Under Gallery as well. The last time that we debated this subject there were so many South Africans sitting there, interested in bringing coal into Britain, that it was busier than Waterloo station. They were trotting back and forth to talk to their Tory friends.

We know what the Bill is about. It was clear from the points of order that we heard earlier—during which you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, made your own enigmatic contribution, which might be interpreted differently according to where it was read out. This whippersnapper from Norfolk, North-West, before he told us that he had been on a paid trip to South Africa, kept telling us that he had some sympathy with the opposers of the carry-over motion. Then, when questioned closely by my hon. Friends, like Paddy Backdown he changed his mind in about five minutes and adopted an entirely different argument. I suspect that when he and his Friends, such as the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown), have been to South Africa they have not just been on site visits. They are part of a Tory party that is almost a wholly-owned subsidiary of South Africa, and the Bill exemplifies that.

Another reason for my opposing the motion is that this is a mammoth Bill. It is not just one of your pottering little private Members' Bills that appear on the Order Paper every Tuesday and Thursday. This is a Bill which, according to my hon. Friends, has 19 byelaws. The byelaw in clause 21 gives this company the power to dump whatever rubbish it likes into the Humber.

Some of that rubbish will no doubt filter down towards Norfolk, North-West, and I suppose that the hooray Henry opposite, the hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West, will come running to the House complaining. He will turn into one of those environment specimens that the Prime Minister has suddenly become. However, I must say that I cannot visualise this Prime Minister in a green anorak and sandals, talking about protecting the environment. I cannot see her sailing up the Humber on a Greenpeace ship looking for the rubbish—the oil and the chemicals—that will have been deposited by this firm if this carry-over motion is approved. I cannot visualise this faded blonde aboard a Greenpeace ship clearing up the rubbish.

We saw the Prime Minister in St. James's park, with the Secretary of State for the Environment on hand with a little bag, but I cannot see her on that Greenpeace ship clearing up the muck in the Humber. However, I can see her husband not far behind with an Attwoods flag in his hand—representing a waste disposal company of which he is the deputy managing director—running to this firm called Simon Engineering, which is a promoter of the Bill, and saying, "We will pick up some of the rubbish. I have Karen B just outside and we will take it provided that the money is right—and we will have a gin and tonic on it while we are at it." The Government have the cheek to talk about the environment, when hidden in this private Bill is the facility for this company to dump oil and chemicals.

I am against this carry-over motion, too, because of the point that I made on two previous occasions about the Chairman of the Committee. He has sat in the House. He was in the House on the last occasion that I raised this matter during business questions. I believe it is a scandal that the Tory party, having failed to put one of its South African Members—one of the hon. Members with interests in Johannesburg—on to this Committee, has found it necessary to make the Chairman of the Committee, who represents the Tory interest, none other than the hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark). It may be that he did not want the job of Chairman of the Committee, but it stinks in the nostrils, because Simon Engineering, the promoter of the Bill, has a subsidiary which is a member of a trade association, the British Chemical Engineering Contractors Association, whose address is 1 Regent street—just up the road—and the hon. Member for Rochford is a paid parliamentary adviser to that association.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before the hon. Gentleman goes further, I should advise him that in the light of his representations, Mr. Speaker had careful inquiries made into the allegations, which he is now repeating to some degree, and was satisfied that there was no degree of impropriety whatsoever.

Mr. Skinner: All I have to say is that there was never any chance of one of the Opposition Whips or representatives going along to members of the miners' group and saying, "We know that you are a sponsored member of the National Union of Mineworkers. We are going to put you on this private Bill." I have a sneaking feeling that if that recommendation had gone to the Chairman of the Committee of Selection—another Tory, the hon. Member for Shipley (Sir M. Fox)—he would have ruled it out of order. I repeat what I said earlier, that the Bill should have been stopped the moment that that Tory Member was allowed to go on that Committee and, even further, was made its Chairman.

History will record that this private Bill procedure has been rotten to the core from the moment that these two Bills hit the Floor of the House. It is no coincidence that they come from apartheid-ridden South Africa, which wishes to export coal to Britain, when the wages paid to black people are one seventh of those paid to white people who work in that ill-fated province. Botha's regime is represented right across the Tory party. I am fed up to the back teeth with hearing Tory Members saying, "We are against apartheid, but . . ." When they get the opportunity to bolster their interests in the Botha regime, by Christ they do it.

There was no better example of that than when the Prime Minister went belting through the Lobby on the last occasion, carrying well over 150 Tory Members with her, to get rid of jobs in Britain. By God, what a place it has become. Then the Tories stand up and talk about apartheid. They go trotting off to meetings here, there and everywhere, saying that they are against it, but on every possible occasion they pour money into the pockets of those who are depriving the massive majority of the population of votes.

They then have the cheek to tell us that they are worried about the blacks in the pits. They are not worried about the coal miners in Yorkshire, Durham, Derbyshire or even in the Nottinghamshire and the midlands coalfield—those who bailed out the Government during the 1984-85 strike. They used those miners in the Nottinghamshire coalfield, and now they come along to the House and say, "We will pass a Bill and kick them out of their jobs"—all those people in the bosses' union.

Mr. Cunliffe: May I declare an interest? On the question of the Queensberry rules, on 6 October a South African ship called the Fasiline Avra arrived at Killingholme. It had on board 26,500 tonnes of South African coal. It was bought by William Reed of Solid

[Mr. Cunliffe]

Fuels, associated with Simon Engineering, screened by Coalite and then sold to the CEGB by trickery and deception. That is the sort of tactic that we face. And then they plead for the African miner and the British miner, who are brothers in arms in the search for freedom.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman might get in eventually. The hon. Gentleman received a knighthood because he grovelled to that Front Bench. What a man. He reckoned to be protecting the interests of people in Cambridge who were going to knock hell out of the Government for about five minutes in 1986-87, but nearer to the election he went running a mile and someone said, "Shut your mouth and we will give you a knighthood." So he went and practised like Cyril Smith.

Sir Anthony Grant rose——

Mr. Skinner: Get yourself down. What I am saying is that the hon. Gentleman should have a word with his hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes, because he knows the way to South Africa on a freebie. He knows how to get there for several days or several weeks. If the hon. Gentleman has not already been there, he can get on a trip. If his hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes does not give him the advice, he should talk to his hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North-West, who will tell him how to get there. The hon. Gentleman has a multitude of friends in the Tory party who know the way to South Africa without putting their hands into their back pockets. If the hon. Gentleman wants to get away from the Prime Minister because he is fed up to the back teeth with her, he should ask them the way. He will be told and provided with the money.

Sir Anthony Grant rose——

Mr. Skinner: No. I have some hon. Friends who want to speak when I have finished.

Sir Anthony Grant: I shall not be long.

Mr. Skinner: You want to be worried about the balance of payments.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wish that the hon. Gentleman would stop referring to me.

Mr. Skinner: You are worried about the balance of payments. You are worried about unemployment in Doncaster if the Bill is passed and thousands of miners' jobs are lost in that area. You will be running along there with my hon. Friends from Doncaster trying to find the answers. I know that deep down at least—I might be stretching a point here—you know that everything that our people have had to say on this issue has been bang on the nail. You know only too well, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that this means a black day for British miners. It means that jobs will be lost.

Mr. Lofthouse: It means that 76,000 jobs will be lost.

Mr. Skinner: My hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract and Castleford (Mr. Lofthouse) gave us that figure in a previous debate, and that is the total if we include the spin-off jobs.

Our mining industry adds about £500 million to the balance of payments. The other day the Chancellor of the Exchequer had the audacity to say that one of the reasons why the Government had been able to pay so much money in debt repayments was that they had saved £1,000 million because dole queues had decreased. We are opposing the carry-over motion because we do not want more people thrown on to the dole. The Bill will mean that more people will have to go to employment exchanges, and that will mean a loss of revenue—just the opposite of what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said the other day. I have no doubt, however, that he will be telling his friends to turn up in the Lobby tonight.

This year we have a £13 billion balance of payments deficit and a massive manufacturing trade deficit, but here we are talking about giving commercial opportunities to South African and other foreign interests within the Common Market to launder coal through ports such as Amsterdam and Rotterdam. Coal will be brought into this country via those ports and will make our balance of payments deficit worse. Not only are the Government going to throw people out of work, but they are going to add to the £13 billion deficit that already exists.

If one considers why we have got into this mess with our balance of payments, it is clear to everyone that it is because our manufacturing industry has been decimated because our coal industry has been hammered, and because we are importing so much oil. We went through it all before in the 1950s and the 1960s. We warned the Tories about importing coal and running down our mining industry. Then the result was another balance of payments crisis. For a temporary period in our history, however, we have recently managed to overcome the problem as a result of North sea oil. Yet, here we are with North sea oil still available, but with a massive balance of payments deficit. The Bill will make matters worse. No wonder those in West Germany and Japan are laughing all the way to the bank. They are sitting on a $120 billion surplus between them, but we are getting further and further into the mire.

I am concerned about those miners and others who will be thrown out of work in Doncaster, Derbyshire, Durham, Nottinghamshire and the rest of the midland coalfields. Everyone should be concerned about that—my hon. Friends and I certainly are.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South) rose——

Mr. Skinner: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman because I believe that he voted with us on one occasion.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: The hon. Gentleman is quite right. My colleagues and I voted with him on 23 June. The hon. Gentleman is making an emotional address to the House. He is usually a fair man, and I think he should recognise that, on that night, only 63 people voted with him, 11 of them Tory Members. I do not believe that that suggests that there is strong support within the Labour party for opposition to the Bill. Can the hon. Gentleman explain that to the House?

Mr. Skinner: It is quite simple. I am not the Chief Whip of the Labour party. We have never had a Whip on this Bill. Because of my emotions about the Bill, I believe that more of our people should have been there for that vote. I am sure that the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) will recall that, on the second occasion, we doubled our numbers. I should like to think that on this occasion even more of my hon. Friends will be here, but I should tell the hon. Gentleman that, unlike the Tories, we have not put a Whip on the Bill.

From the beginning the Tory party has not considered that the Bill represents narrow private interests. They have always seen it as a way in which to help South African interests. The Tories allowed the hon. Member for Nottingham, South to have a token vote against the Bill. Why? Because his constituency is part of the Nottinghamshire coalfield, and the Government wanted the people in the Union of Democratic Mineworkers to say, "We got our man to vote for us." The Tories allowed that in the knowledge that for every 10 people who voted with the Opposition, they could bring in another 50 to cancel those votes.

Mr. Redmond: I wonder whether we can clear up this matter of the Tory Whip once and for all. I wish that the Conservative Members present were honourable enough to tell the House that there is a two-line Whip on the Bill, because Tory Members who are not in the Chamber have told us that that is so. Are the Conservative Members present calling their colleagues liars? I would sooner believe their colleagues. It is true, because I have seen the agenda paper submitted by Conservative Whips.

Mr. Skinner: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He comes in early in the morning and, during the past few years, I have noticed how he has begun to get the feel of this place. He has got to know what is happening. I have seen him go down to that Tory side of the Tea Room where there is a little barrier. Initially I thought that he was just reading the papers, but I think that he has been hanging the tab. He has found out what has been going on. If he says that there is a two-line Whip, my guess is that——

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to discuss factual information rather than opinion. I have a note from my Whip which says that there is Government business later tonight, for which I am needed as a Parliamentary Private Secretary, but that I am perfectly free to vote as I will on this Bill. I believe that that applies to everyone else on the Conservative Benches.

Mr. Redmond: Further to that point of order, Miss Boothroyd. Whether the hon. Gentleman has had permission from the Whips to vote freely one way or the other is not the issue. Let me tell the hon. Gentleman that the Tory Whips have put a two-line Whip on this Bill. Later on this evening, the Tories will come out of their rat holes to support the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes.

Mr. Skinner: I agree with my hon. Friend. The reason why the hon. Member for Nottingham, South does not believe that there is a Whip is that he is one of the Conservative Members representing Nottinghamshire. He is that naive that he does not understand that the Tory party has issued a two-line Whip to everyone except those representing Nottinghamshire. The hon. Gentleman is not smart enough to understand that he is being left out. My hon. Friend sussed that out at the beginning. The Tories are kidding the hon. Member for Nottingham, South on.

Mr. Michael Brown rose——

Mr. Skinner: No, get off to the American embassy.

Another reason why we are against the Bill is that we know that it is a review to privatisation, not just of the coal mining industry, but of the electricity industry. Those are all sound political reasons for the Bill. Our argument is not about private Bills, but about political will and the Government wanting to help their own interests. They want to line the pockets of those who have connections with South Africa. The purpose of the Bill is to bring in coal from South Africa, and that will lead to British pits being closed down. As a result, more people will be on the dole and we shall have a bigger balance of payments problem.

The Bill has been an abuse of parliamentary procedure from beginning to end. Every Member on the Labour Benches is opposing this carry-over motion. That opposition does not come only from my hon. Friends who represent the mining industry, but also from those who represent the docks industry. We know that jobs will be lost because of the Bill. We want to save jobs and we want to save money. We also want to ensure that the procedures of the House are not abused in the way in which they have been on this occasion.

8.8 pm

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): This debate gives Members a further opportunity to highlight the dangers to our coal industry if the proposed Humber ports are allowed to proceed. Before proceeding with arguments against the motion, I should like to say that when the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) denigrated the Chairman of the Committee which considered the Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark), he did not help our case one bit.

The widespread fear about the Bill is that the new ports will allow the United Kingdom market to be flooded with imports of subsidised coal, much of it possibly dumped on the market. If that took place, it could have a severe effect on the British coal industry, leading to colliery closures.

The supporters of the Bill have told the House of its virtues in job creation, cheaper coal and cheaper electricity, but they have omitted to tell us for how long those conditions will apply. Is it one year, five years or more? Have their memories dimmed so much that they have forgotten the cartel hype in oil prices in 1973, 1979, and 1981, and the fact that our only protection from international blackmail at that time was our coal industry, giving predictable prices to its major buyers in the short and longer term, which no importer of coal will give or can contemplate, considering the fluctuating value of the dollar?

Today's world market coal prices are 40 per cent. higher than a year ago. Since I spoke on Second Reading of the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill on 11 May, prices have risen by 15 per cent—in all, equivalent to a £10 per tonne increase. Therefore, before the House makes an irreversible decision, we should let the past be a guide to the future. It tells us two important facts: first, that indigenous supplies must be available at all times; and, secondly, that they should be at known prices and with fixed long-term contracts. We shall have neither of those things if the ports are built, giving unscrupulous foreign coal producers the opportunity within six months to decimate the industry, with premature colliery closures.

[Mr. Andy Stewart]

Apart from the human tragedy of job losses, that would liquidate without return the billions of pounds invested on behalf of the British taxpayer in the coal industry.

Mr. Hardy: The hon. Gentleman referred to unscrupulous importers. He will be aware that in the past 12 months a substantial quantity of coal has been imported to this country, labelled as Dutch coal produced in the Netherlands. The hon. Gentleman will know well that there are no collieries in the Netherlands and that that coal imported into Britain that is described as Dutch is actually South African. As he has perceived that there is unscrupulous conduct, will the hon. Gentleman join us in asking the Minister to respond to the point that unscrupulous and probably unlawful behaviour has already taken place? Our opposition to the Bill would discourage unscrupulous operators from further dishonesty.

Mr. Stewart: I had better make it clear what I said. I referred to unscrupulous foreign coal producers. There is a difference. One must be careful not to lump all importers into the group that the hon. Gentleman describes. However, the Minister was listening to what the hon. Gentleman said.

I can hear our opponents saying, "So what? British Coal has caused enough trouble in the past 15 years with three strikes, vast expenditure of taxpayers' money and a dangerous exposure of elected Governments to extraparliamentary pressure." It is a straightforward question which deserves a straightforward answer. Those days are behind us for good and the coal industry is back on the road to being a modern and respectable business. The central policy at the heart of everything that British Coal has been doing is the judgment that, if it is to survive, the coal delivered to its United Kingdom customers must match the sustainable price of international coal delivered to United Kingdom users. "Sustainable" means the price that could reasonably remunerate new investment in favourable geological conditions in exporting countries.

The other half of the equation is about bringing our costs down to meet international coal prices as they come back into balance. The transformation in British Coal since the strike is remarkable. The latest productivity figure is up 74 per cent. and our costs are down by over 30 per cent. in real terms. The last time British Coal increased its prices in line with inflation was at the start of 1981. With a further price freeze that means that, in real terms, coal prices will be over 25 per cent. down on four years ago.

Mr. Lofthouse: The hon. Gentleman mentioned all the wonderful achievements in the coal industry, which we are all pleased about. The price of coal to the Central Electricity Generating Board is about £42 a tonne compared with £20 to £28 a tonne for imports of coal subsidised by foreign Governments. If that continues, how can we hope to compete?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. That is why I shall vote against the motion. Within six months, some of our marginal collieries could be closed. Perhaps it will lead to job losses. However, the British coal industry and those who work in it are taking steps to enable us to compete with that imported coal, but not at subsidised prices.

From that experience, it is now possible to look forward to the final stage of the transformation of British Coal. By 1990, British deep-mined coal will compete well with any imported coal, but will it be allowed fair and unfettered competition? I believe not, because the stakes are too high for the exporting countries to allow the British coal industry the time to complete its transformation. For me, the risks not only to the Nottinghamshire and other coalfields, but to those who work in the industry, particularly the 27,000 in Nottinghamshire, are too great. Therefore, I ask the Houe to reject the motion.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): I take great pride in being called to speak against this bad Bill. It is important to consider the effect on Nottinghamshire if the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill proceeds through the House.

One of the primary reasons why we should not carry the Bill over into the next Session is that, beyond any shadow of a doubt, it is racist. If any Conservative Member doubts that, he should recall the words of a South African Prime Minister, who said that every £1 invested in South Africa was another brick in the wall of apartheid. That will happen if the Bill proceeds. Without any shadow of a doubt, that has been one of the prime motivations for the Bill because if the ports proceed, imported South African coal will take over British Coal's market in the United Kingdom. The Bill seeks purely to secure a major trade route for imported coal into Britain, particularly South African coal. It seeks to undermine current port capacity and takes no account of the effect on the coalfield communities.

Both these private Bills represent purely commercial interests and should not have been taken in the manner in which they have been treated. They will undermine the national interest, with our future dependence on the importation of foreign coal. The Conservative party has a great belief in privatisation. We should remember that the Bills will greatly devalue national assets. We still have many decades of coal supplies left. The value of coal mines, with their plant and machinery and the investments that are being made, will be vastly reduced if the Bills are enacted. Most important of all are the mining communities that have invested their lives in the British coal mining industry.

I should like to refer to an article, which was passed to me recently, that concerns South African coal imports. The article appeared in "SA Coal Insight" and gives a detailed account of the visit made by the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown). The article says:

"The aim of this February visit was to provide the delegation with a comprehensive insight into all the issues related to the South African Coal Industry. The ultimate motive was to explain the threat that exists to 30,000 mine workers and 8,000 associated workers through the imposition of sanctions against the coal industry."

I want to ask the hon. Gentleman what will happen to the British coal mining industry. Should we not be concerned about that? Some of my hon. Friends have referred to the 76,000 jobs in the mining communities—50,000 directly in coal mining and 26,000 in subsidiary areas. Those jobs are not in the affluent south, but in the midlands, the north, Wales and Scotland, which already have high levels of unemployment.

Mr. Lofthouse: Does my hon. Friend agree that the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) ought to notify miners in his constituency that the Central Electricity Generating Board's figures show that, of the 19 pits in Nottinghamshire, nine will close? He should tell them that his own Government are pushing through Bills that, if successful, will lead to the closure of nine pits in Nottinghamshire.

Mr. Meale: To add to what my hon. Friend has just said, I should like to draw the attention of the House to the unemployment figures for the Mansfield area—which covers Sherwood and parts of Ashfield. Because of Government policies that have been pursued since 1979, there is considerable idle labour in Mansfield. At the moment, 6,224 men and 2,188 women remain idle, so there are now 8,412 people who are unemployed because of the Government's policies. As a result of the Government's trade policy and their inability to act in the textile industry, the largest knitwear manufacturing base in the EEC announced its closure two weeks ago, and a further 850 jobs will disappear.

Let us consider the unemployment figures elsewhere. In Nottinghamshire, 47,500 people are unemployed, in Leicestershire, where there are also coal mines, 25,668 are unemployed, and in Derbyshire the figure is 38,275. The total unemployed in those areas is about 112,000.

The Bills will have a considerable effect on the Nottinghamshire pits. Already, 50 million tonnes of the coal produced in Nottinghamshire, Yorkshire and Derbyshire goes directly to power stations in the area. It has already been explained that, if the ports are developed, the CEGB will purchase South African and other imported coal. According to the Select Committee on Energy, in the first year, the West Burton area power stations will use 500,000 tonnes of imported coal and in the third year, the figure will be 8 million tonnes. That will lead to 15 pit closures out of the 18 remaining pits in Nottinghamshire.

Mr. Michael Welsh (Doncaster, North): There is another point to be added. If cheap coal comes from South Africa, does it not mean that British Coal will be unable to plan new investment and that investment in new pits will stop because British pits will not have the chance to supply coal? A pit is not like a factory—it cannot close and then open again. The critical path is 10 to 15 years. Therefore one must plan ahead. We shall lose millions of pounds as a nation because of cheap coal. The importers will have their hands on the tap and will be able to turn it on or off to suit themselves, as the oil producers did in the 1950s and 1960s.

Mr. Meale: That is absolutely true. I also draw that point to the attention of the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) and other hon. Members from Nottinghamshire who have turned up to vote against the Bills, and I thank them for coming here.

All the pits in Nottinghamshire that supply power stations will be affected. Blidworth colliery supplies 51 per cent. of its coal direct to power stations, Calverton supplies 80 per cent., Ollerton 87 per cent., Thoresby 93 per cent., Creswell 95 per cent., Harworth 97 per cent., Bilsthorpe 98 per cent. and Silverhill 98 per cent. One hundred per cent. of the production at Bevercotes, Cotegrave, Sherwood, Welbeck and Clipstone goes directly to power stations. As the hon. Member for Sherwood knows, six of the pits that I have mentioned have been included, in the past few days, in the review procedure that British Coal is carrying out in the Nottinghamshire area.

Mr. Andy Stewart: That is entirely untrue. The review procedures are not those that the hon. Gentleman has come across before. They are the normal discussions that take place every three months in those collieries. I investigated the matter on Monday, and I was given that assurance by British Coal and the trade unions.

Mr. Meale: I hope that those assurances are better than the ones that I and other hon. Members have received in the past from British Coal in Nottinghamshire. Undoubtedly, the decision whether to keep open some of those collieries in the near future will be influenced by whether the Bills are passed tonight rather than being carried over into the next Session. Areas such as Mansfield, Bolsover, Chesterfield and parts of south Yorkshire will be faced with utter turmoil and destruction unless the Bills are defeated this evening.

Mr. Bellingham: Can the hon. Gentleman say with his hand on his heart that the evidence is that there will be a big increase in the volume of imported coal? If the market were able to accept such volumes, it would surely have done so already, as reasonably good facilities exist. What evidence does the hon. Gentleman have?

Mr. Meale: I wish that that hon. Gentleman had listened when I referred to the report of the Select Committee on Energy. The CEGB in the West Burton power station group will take 500,000 tonnes in the first year, 2 million tonnes in the second and 8 million tonnes in the third. That will lead to the closure of some of the pits in Nottinghamshire.

If the hon. Gentleman wants other examples, I draw his attention to the imports that are already coming in and to one of the companies that is involved in these Bills—Van Ommeron, the Dutch company which imported into Europe 5·8 million tonnes of South African coal last year, of which 2·9 million tonnes came directly into the United Kingdom. Every tonne of coal that comes into this country puts British mining jobs at risk; no hon. Member can dispute that.

I remember asking the hon. Member for Johannesburg in the previous debate whether he had ever held any position or received any gift from any of the companies involved in the Bill.

Mr. Michael Brown: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I think that the hon. Gentleman's question was directed to me. I am the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes, but I presume that the hon. Gentleman was referring to me.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will make that clear. I call Mr. Meale.

Mr. Meale: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. During the past 12 months and more, I have heard the hon. Gentleman's references to South Africa many times, so I automatically assumed that he represented Johannesburg. I apologise for that.

Mr. Michael Brown: I was asked why I should be promoting the Bills and what my relationship was with

[Mr. Michael Brown]

Associated British Ports and the promoters of the North Killingholme Cargo Terminal Bill. I have no position, and I derive not a penny from either company, although I have to admit that I was given lunch at the headquarters of Associated British Ports, when we discussed whether it would be proper for me to sponsor the Bill. The simple reason for my sponsoring the Bills is that the major works involved in both are to take place in my constituency. I would say to my constituents and to members of political parties outside the House that I hope that if there were ever a Labour or a Liberal Member of Parliament for Brigg and Cleethorpes, he too would promote such Bills.

Mr. Meale: I remind the hon. Gentleman that he accepted a free trip to South Africa. That raises the question whether it is ethical for an hon. Member to accept such a gift when he is a member of a Committee of the House that is discussing related issues. That is the moral question that the House will have to consider, and I only hope that it will make the right decision.

Mr. Martin M. Brandon-Bravo (Nottingham, South): The passion felt by Labour Members is clearly not matched by a willingness to put their time and their votes where their words suggest they should. Their opposition may make very good copy for the press and the media as it did in June, but that is about the limit. Words are enough as long as they appear in the paper—[Interruption.] Opposition Members' criticism is that there is an organised lobby. You must look into your own hearts to make up your own minds.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is not speaking to the Chair.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I apologise, Madam Deputy Speaker. Opposition Members must look into their own hearts and consciences and decide whether their conduct in June matched the passion of their speeches.

As part of the debate about carrying over consideration of the Bills, I think that it is relevant to remind the House that the vote in June was no late-night vote on a Thursday, when one could perhaps have forgiven Scottish and other Labour Members for catching the sleeper home. The vote was taken at 8·29 pm. At that time, early in the evening, only 63 hon. Members voted against Second Reading and 11 were Conservative Members. I shall not waste the time of the House by reading out the list, but I suggest that the absence of the other 150 Labour Members should be a matter of shame for them.

Mr. Lofthouse: Will the hon. Gentleman also inform the Nottinghamshire newspapers that the Government shoved the measure through by the payroll vote?

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: That is one of the defences that Labour Members have put around to try to cover their tracks on that disgraceful affair.

That night, to my certain knowledge, three Conservative Members who voted against Second Reading were Parliamentary Private Secretaries. They had a clear undertaking that the Government took no position and that they were perfectly free to vote as they chose. There is no way that the Government can be accused of wheeling out the payroll vote.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Will the hon. Gentleman comment on a conversation that took place between the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science and the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) in the Tea Room earlier today? The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes was asked about the whipping arrangements for this business and said, "It is whipped but we are supposed to be keeping that quiet." It is a two-line Whip for Ministers, is it not?

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) can speak for himself, although it is fair to say that if one is sponsoring a private Bill, one will use every method in one's power to get the minimum 100 people into the Chamber. I know that my hon. Friend was almost soiling his pants in June because, if the debate had gone on for another 15 or 20 minutes, Conservative Members who did not have strong views would already have been on their way home and he would not have succeeded in getting the closure motion passed. Only 95 Conservative Members voted for Second Reading 15 minutes after the closure motion was passed. That proves the point that the Tories had begun to go home. The greater shame was that only 35——

Mr. Hardy: Humbug.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: It is true. The record shows that only 35 voted against, and 11 of those were Conservative Members. That seems to suggest that only 20 passionate supporters of the coal industry on the Labour Benches bothered to stay later than 8.30 pm that night.

Mr. Bellingham: Is my hon. Friend aware that a number of those Labour Members present tonight were not among that number? Is that not extraordinary?

Mr. Harry Barnes: Will the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) give way?

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Yes. I agree to give way, but we shall go on all night at this rate.

Mr. Barnes: Will the hon. Gentleman grant that Parliament is not just about going through the Lobbies? It is about debate. Debate is supposed to be an important part of our proceedings, especially in connection with private Bills, as hon. Members may be persuaded by such debate. On the Conservative Benches, the debate has involved the four hon. Members who have spoken tonight, the Minister and the hon. Member for Newark (Mr. Alexander). The Labour Benches have been full of hon. Members who have wished to involve themselves in the debate but who have been prevented from doing so by the pressure of time. At the end of each of the five debates, Labour Members have been jumping to their feet seeking to catch Mr. Speaker's eye.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: It is also worth pointing out that only one senior Minister was here that night in June. Of course the House is about debate. Labour Members must surely concede that the understandable passion displayed in June—and again tonight, by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)—should have been matched by action and that more than 20 Labour Members should have bothered to stay behind to defend the mining industry. That is a matter of shame for Labour Members. Certainly you may——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is not addressing the Chair.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I beg your pardon, Madam Deputy Speaker. Labour Members may criticise Conservative Members for voting to give the Bill its Second Reading, but a substantial number of Conservative Members want free enterprise. They want competition from imports and argue that the lower electricity prices that will ensue will be better for other industries, which might create more jobs. Those are the arguments advanced by Conservative Members in favour of the Bill. For all the debate and for all the arguments and passion from the Labour Benches, only 20-odd Labour Members bothered to be there to vote in June. That is a matter of shame.

Throughout the debates on these Bills, the South African connection has damaged the Opposition's case more than it has helped it. I understand the arguments about the Dutch connection. It always puzzles me to hear from Opposition Members that ours is the only country in Europe which is sympathetic to South Africa; they go on to say that the Dutch are sending us relabelled South African coal. That seems a little contradictory. I remind the House of the careful and well reasoned speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester), who said that South African coal is of minor consequence and is not the main argument used by those of us who oppose the Bill. As my hon. Friend said, the real threat is from opencast coal from Colombia, Australia and China, which is to be sold as a means of earning hard currency——

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that, because of sanctions, South Africa has been losing 9 million or 10 million tonnes a year in sales? Somehow those losses must be made up—hence these coal Bills, which are designed to create another market for South African coal.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: The hon. Gentleman misses the point. I am not disputing whether we should import coal from South Africa. I acknowledge the arguments on both sides. My point is that Conservative Members representing Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire and Leicestershire believe that South African coal is a minor part of our opposition to the Bill. The greater threat of imports is from Colombia, Australia and China, and we should be concentrating on that.

I understand the remarks made by the hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) about racism, but I am trying to leave that out of the debate——

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): The hon. Gentleman, of all people, should understand racism.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: —and not for the reason given by that silly man. I beg your pardon, Madam Deputy Speaker, but Conservative Members are being criticised and personally insulted for not going along with the knee-jerk reactions of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery), who calls us pro-South African.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand that tempers are running high on this matter, but hon. Members should be addressed correctly.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo rose——

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Gentleman has referred to me in scathing terms. My hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) talked about racism. We know that the black South African workers support sanctions. They are poor people, hounded into compounds, who produce cheap coal with which our miners cannot possibly compete. If the hon. Gentleman supports that system but denies that it is racist, let him square that with his conscience.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I do not seek to deny or challenge any of those points, but by focusing almost exclusively on the importation of South African coal, via Rotterdam or anywhere else, Opposition Members undermine the case we are trying to make.

Conservative Members have other reasons——

Mr. Flannery: Additional reasons.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Granted, but the main thrust of our argument is that Colombian, Australian and Chinese coal will enter this country. That is why we oppose the Bill; the South African connection may be an additional reason for opposition. In speech after speech, Opposition Members have attempted to make a virility symbol of their attitudes to South Africa, which undermines their case——

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I am a little confused about the hon. Gentleman's reference to Colombia, a country in which there is a human rights crisis. Fewer than six lawyers are left to defend trade unionists there. Would you expound on that a little?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady should address her remarks through the Chair.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: I cannot comment on that point, but the hon. Lady is making my case for me. The position of labour in Colombia is appalling, which is why its coal is priced far below a sum that could be called the result of fair pricing. British Coal is faced with unfair competition from Colombian coal. That is why I oppose the Bill and hope that enough hon. Members will enter the No Lobby to ensure that it is not passed.

Mr. George J. Buckley (Hemsworth): The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) concentrated his arguments on the shortcomings of Opposition Members who have not voted against the Bill after previous debates. I remind him that he must also criticise Conservative Members who support the Bill in spite of all the things that he has said. They support unfair competition and apartheid coal from South Africa. They support the running down of British Coal and an increase in unemployment. They support the waste of capital investment by British Coal in this country. The hon. Gentleman should criticise his hon. Friends for that support.

We base our opposition on the impact that the proposals will have on, and their economic consequences for, our constituencies. The hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) spoke of the Bill's importance to King's Lynn and reminded us that in a previous debate he had said that the Bill would generate about 100 jobs in his constituency. I commend the hon. Gentleman for promoting the interests of his constituents, even though unemployment in his area is only 6·5 per cent., but I remind him that we in the mining communities suffer from unemployment that is three times as high.

In Hemsworth, unemployment is currently 18 to 20 per cent. Historically, the constituency has depended on coal mining. This week British Coal announced that 1,000 more mining jobs are at risk, on top of the 11,000 that have been lost in Wakefield metropolitan district area in the past five years. So the South African connection must not be seen in isolation from its direct consequences for people in our constituencies, who will suffer if the Bill is passed.

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): Is my hon. Friend aware of the consequences for the mining engineering supplies industry, which is still a major employer in my constituency? So far this year, 253 jobs have been destroyed in that industry. Does he agree that it is a disgrace and a gross misuse of Parliament that the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) should represent the interests of a Fascist regime, so helping to create jobs and assist economic development in that Fascist regime at the expense of places such as Wakefield?

Mr. Buckley: I thank my hon. Friend for making that important point. Reference has been made to this measure allowing 10 million tonnes of coal to be imported, possibly making 40,000 miners redundant, and now my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) has added another dimension by drawing attention to the knock-on effect on the mining engineering supplies industry.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): My hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Buckley) is making an excellent speech. Does he agree that the general multiplier is three, and that if the jobs of 40,000 miners are at stake, that means the total number at risk will be about 120,000, as jobs in the service and supply industries will also disappear? Unquestionably, some of them will be in the small firms about which the Tories are supposed to be concerned. Nevertheless, Conservative Members intend voting in a way that will squash those small firms.

Mr. Buckley: I accept the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer).

This matter is not only political; it affects the country's economy. The Bill will be to the detriment not only of mining communities, such as Hemsworth, but of other areas of the country, as has been mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield. The Prime Minister persistently claims that she and her Government are backing Britain, whereas they are undermining the British economy, and the mining industry in particular, by obtaining the approval of the House for this Bill. There seems to be a conflict of policy because the Government appear to be pursuing a line that will jeopardise our mining industry in the not-too-distant future.

One of the problems confronting British Coal is that it was encouraged by numerous Governments to undertake high investment in order to improve bulk output. As a consequence of the run-down in manpower, that investment has become increasingly critical. At the point where that investment is about to provide the bulk coal that our country requires, the Government, with this Bill, will provide facilities that will vastly increase coal imports.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): Is this not the point to distinguish between the arguments advanced from the Government Benches and those made by the Opposition? I represent a constituency where there is an Associated British port, but I am not looking to make that argument tonight.

My hon. Friends have questioned the validity of the introduction of the Bill. It has wide implications for and will influence a number of industries. We are arguing the broader case for the mining industry. Conservative Members make only the narrow argument—respected though it may be at some time—for constituency interests rather than for the broader interests that we represent.

Mr. Buckley: I take my hon. Friend's point.

It ill behoves Conservative Members to criticise the lack of Opposition support for this measure. The question is whether Conservative Members are prepared to support a general view rather than the narrow one of those who are promoting the Bill.

Mr. Michael Brown rose——

Mr. Buckley: The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) will be able to make his comments later.

Mr. Brown: No, I shall not, as I have already spoken.

Mr. Buckley: As the hon. Gentleman has already made his points, he must give me an opportunity to comment on the Bill that he is sponsoring. The hon. Gentleman will appreciate the conventions of the House. He must give others an opportunity to make their points.

The argument is so wide that it will have far-reaching consequences beyond the economics of mining communities. Local authorities, for example, will also feel the consequences, as they will suffer a loss of revenue resulting from colliery closures. Local authorities' economics will also be undermined by the Bill.

Mr. Cryer: Will it not also undermine British Coal's economics? One of the obligations revealed during the miners' strike was that the recovery and rehabilitation of colliery sites is a continuing cost against British Coal's revenue. Colliery closures will compound the situation, as it will make the price per tonne extracted from the remaining pits even higher.

Mr. Buckley: I agree with my hon. Friend.

The House should not take lightly the economic consequences of these two Bills being carried over to the next Session. They will be dramatic and devastating for mining communities and for the country as a whole.

8.57 pm

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I may inform you, Madam Deputy Speaker, that you missed a first-class contribution earlier this evening from my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

Madam Deputy Speaker: I may tell the hon. Member that I did listen to it.

Mr. Haynes: Obviously, I hit the wrong mark.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover hit every nail on the head. [Interruption.] Perhaps the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) will listen. He is busy gasbagging to the Whip instead of listening to this important and serious debate on whether the ports should be allowed to continue and to expand at the expense, probably, of the mining industry.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo rose——

Mr. Haynes: I have only just started—sit down!

I want to say right at the outset that I am opposed to the proposal to carry over into the next Session the two private Bills that we are debating. I am opposed for a number of reasons.

The hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) has got it wrong. He does not understand what is going on. He will vote with us tonight, but he does not understand what is going on. He has not worked in the mining industry. He has pushed a plough, tilling the land in the north of Nottinghamshire. I admit that I know nothing about farming, but I know something about coal mining and I know what we are talking about tonight.

The hon. Member for Sherwood came to this place in 1983 after serving for a short period on Nottinghamshire county council organising swings and roundabouts for kids. That is the work he has done out there in Nottinghamshire. That was his only interest—leisure.

Mr. Andy Stewart rose——

Mr. Haynes: No, I will not give way.

In days, months and years gone by, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover has regularly told the Prime Minister at the Dispatch Box about the money that has been poured into the farmers' pockets, and that is still going on.

Mr. Skinner: On average, £13 a week for every farmer in Britain.

Mr. Stewart rose——

Mr. Haynes: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. Other hon. Members want to speak. The hon. Gentleman has made his contribution, although he made a mess of it. He did not say the right things because he does not understand. He is a groveller too.

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman does not want to hear the truth.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I would be much obliged if the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr Haynes) would refer to the motion.

Mr. Haynes: I am trying hard to, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The hon. Member for Sherwood need not wave his hand at me. I shall say what I want to say in this debate. We recently debated Health Service charges that will affect many miners in my constituency who have worked in the pits for as many years as I have and were trying to enjoy certain social security benefits.

Mr. Stewart rose——

Mr. Haynes: That was the end result of what the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) did last week—I shall drag him in as well—when both voted in favour of Health Service charges. They then told the Nottingham Evening Post, "We had to do it. We might have lost our jobs as Parliamentary Private Secretaries."

Mr. Stewart rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Member for Ashfield once more that the carry-over motion relates to a particular Bill and I hope that he will respect the wishes of the Chair and relate his remarks to the motion.

Mr. Haynes: I shall try to do so. I was provoked by the hon. Member for Sherwood and the hon. Member for Nottingham, South—well, one of them anyway.

I am opposed to the carry-over motion simply because of the effect that it will have in my constituency in particular and elsewhere, such as Bolsover, Derbyshire, Leicestershire and Yorkshire. It will have a serious effect in Yorkshire. No Conservative Member has mentioned Yorkshire. This will have a serious effect on the Yorkshire coal mining industry and that hon. Gentleman from——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have appealed to hon Members before this evening. While I am in the Chair, hon. Members will be referred to correctly.

Mr. Haynes: —the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes. You did not let me finish, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: My hearing is as acute as my eyesight.

Mr. Stewart rose——

Mr. Haynes: No, I shall not give way. Other colleagues of mine want to speak. The hon. Gentleman is not going to cover for those Conservatives who are not here. Plenty of Opposition Members want to speak in this debate.

I shall be interested to hear what the new Minister of State has to say on this. He has not spoken at the Dispatch Box on this matter before.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Minister of State is not going to speak.

Mr. Haynes: I did not know that the Minister did not intend to respond to the debate. I am shocked. What is he doing here, if he is not going to respond?

Mr. Hardy: I share my hon. Friend's concern that the Minister is not going to respond. For months and months on private Bills, Ministers have unfailingly risen to the Dispatch Box to announce the Government's absolute neutrality. We have then watched Conservative Members trooping through the Aye Lobby. Will we be saved from that rather preposterous and frequent precedent that has been established? Will the Minister at least intervene, if only briefly, to explain the matter of the false labelling of South African coal coming into British ports, as we fear that South African coal will continue to be brought into the new ports?

Mr. Haynes: I appears that the Minister is not going to respond to my hon. Friend, but I am not going on about that. The Minister has made it pretty obvious that he is not going to respond.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Haynes: No, I am not giving way. Sit down. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Mr. Haynes.

Mr. Haynes: I am entitled to make a speech. I have been called by the Chair. The hon. Gentleman has made his speech; he must sit down and listen to what is going on.

Mr. Cryer: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. I am sure that he will agree that it is a great pity that the Minister will not reply to the debate. For example, the Minister could have outlined the difficulties which the Bills will create for the coal industry, for the engineering supply industry, and for the railway industry, as they will encourage the closures which the Tories have lined up anyhow.

Mr. Haynes: My serious worry is that there used to be nine pits in my constituency, and there are now four. It has been agreed that one of those pits is closing next year, and now we are having a review. The hon. Member for Sherwood does not understand what goes on in a review as far as the bosses in the mining industry are concerned.

I have been in the mining industry 35 years. My hon. Friends have served in that industry for many years and they know what a review is all about. They have been officials at pit level, they have been involved in negotiations, and they have tried to persuade the board not to go in the direction that it wanted to take. The hon. Member for Sherwood does not understand what is going on. There is another review and there will be further pit closures in Nottinghamshire if we are not very careful, and if British Coal has its way.

The hon. Gentleman may wag his head but he still does not know what is going on. If British Coal decides to close the pits, there will be serious opposition from Opposition Members and in the constituencies where those pits are, yet the Bill does not help the situation at all—it makes it worse, as my hon. Friends have said. I hope that as many hon. Members as possible vote against it.

Mr. Bellingham: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. May I ask your advice on an important question? When an hon. Member makes disparaging remarks about another hon. Member and comments adversely on his conduct and knowledge, surely it is incumbent on that hon. Member to give way when the hon. Member who is being criticised and attacked stands up?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I understand the hon. Member's point of order. It is for the hon. Member who has the Floor to decide whether he gives way. Usually, in a challenge such as that, hon. Members give way, but it is entirely for the hon. Member who has the Floor to determine whether he will do that.

Mr. Cryer: Further to that point of order, Miss Boothroyd. I have been following the proceedings very carefully, and I have noticed your very good-tempered conduct of the House. My hon. Friend's speech was continuously marred by Conservative Members standing up and shouting. Therefore, I hope that you will suitably deprecate the behaviour of these lager louts, these pin-striped hooligans——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. If the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) had been as attentive as he usually is, he would have seen that I am very keen to ensure that hon. Members who are not being given the floor are asked to resume their seats.

9.8 pm

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): It is important that we stress the fact that we are debating the coal industry along with the Bill. We are debating one of Britain's biggest assets in energy—coal. We have more coal in this country than we have oil or gas. There are 300 years of coal supplies in this country. From the way in which the Government are trying to import foreign coal, one would think that we had no coal at all. Also, one would not realise that since the miners' strike the miners have increased their productivity by at least 60 per cent.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Seventy-four per cent.

Mr. Campbell: That is even better. One would not think that while listening to Conservative Members.

The Government are importing coal from countries such as Poland, South Africa, China, Colombia, Venezuela, Indonesia and others. I would hazard a guess that not one of those countries is stable. Yet the Government want to bring in 30 million tonnes of coal, with the loss of many miners' jobs. It means that in the northern region—it is on record—there will be only two pits left. This is not the only Bill. We know that there will be more to come. We know that Bills affecting Teesside and Southampton are due. We know that the coal will come to Britain at the whim of countries such as South Africa—and we have all heard about apartheid.

The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) may have had a pleasant trip to South Africa, but, if he is so concerned about his constituency, he should visit the areas that will lose jobs, particularly Nottingham. He should go with his hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) and visit a pit and tell the miners what he is trying to achieve in this Bill.

As well as being at the mercy of the unstable countries, we are at the mercy of the dollar. If the dollar falls or rises, the price of foreign coal becomes unstable. That is a problem that the Government have to sort out, but they cannot.

We know that the pits will close because Tory Members will troop through the Lobbies tonight. They have a two-line Whip. Several hon. Members have been excused so that they can go back to their constituencies and say that they did not vote for the Bill—[Interruption.] It is true.

This progressive and most radical Government—that is what they call themselves—will close the pits and see thousands of miners lose their jobs and thousands of communities hurt yet again. I went through the review with my pit. I won the review, but the Government still closed the pit.

Mr. Andy Stewart: The collieries mentioned in the local evening paper last week are not in the review. It is the local three-monthly review, endorsed by British Coal and the local trade unions.

Mr. Campbell: If they are not in the review now, it wil not be long before they are. That will happen when the coal starts to come into the country and when the men from Associated British Ports get cracking on other ports. That is the danger.

My constituency held the record for exporting coal to Europe in the 1950s, but there is talk of changing the harbour to receive coal from abroad. We have heard about bringing coals to Newcastle. The Government are certainly doing that.

The Government are decimating the coal industry. It has been said by some Ministers, including the Prime Minister, that miners have to stand on their own two feet. The Government are saying to British miners, "Stand on your own two feet while we bring in cheap coal." The importation of cheap coal will destroy our mining industry. Closing a pit is not like closing a factory. Some Conservative members think that a coal mine is a factory that can be stopped by pressing a button. They think that after a couple of years another button can be pressed and the pit will start up again. Once a mine is closed, it is finished and cannot be opened again.

If our mining industry is destroyed, coal prices will be at the whim of the countries that I have mentioned, such as South Africa and China. Those countries will do what the Arabs did in the 1950s. At that time the Arabs were living in tents and had cheap oil for export. Britain's whole economy was built on cheap oil. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) spoke about that. I remember what happened in the 1950s when the Arabs decided that they no longer wanted to live in tents. Oil prices rocketed. As soon as our mining industry has been destroyed, foreign producers will push up their prices and we shall be at the beck and call of the countries that I have mentioned.

The Prime Minister was in Poland last week. What a country to rely on for coal! She was hardly out of the country when Lech Walesa called for a general strike. There will be more strikes there, yet the Government seek to rely on coal from that part of Europe. Coal comes to the spot market and is mixed. The mixture is described as coal from the Netherlands, but we know that it is a mixture of Polish and South African coal and coal from other countries. It is all dumped and then mixed and sold as Netherlands coal.

In my maiden speech a year ago, I said that the Government were out to wreck the coal industry. Perhaps they are trying to do that out of malice. I have the gut feeling that they want to destroy the coal industry. They should heed the warning given by the Opposition in this debate. They risk severe economic problems not only because of imported coal but because industry will have to pay higher prices for coal. I gave that warning in my maiden speech and I give it again. The Government will decimate the British coal industry at their peril. The Prime Minister is directing that destruction, and she is wrong.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): Like my hon. Friends, I oppose the motions which would allow the two private Bills to go into the next Session. There are numerous reasons why the Bills should be withdrawn or discontinued. Some of them have already been given in this debate and others were given on Second Reading.

On Second Reading I asked about the identity of the promoters of the Bills. The matter was raised on Second Reading by my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, North (Mr. Welsh) who is in the Chamber. He said that he could not identify the company promoting the North Killingholme Cargo Terminal Bill. Throughout the following debates, and to some extent in Committee, no light has been thrown on the identity of the company. In Committee the issue appears to have been clouded even further by the introduction of the names of other companies connected with the Bills.

Two companies recently mentioned in connection with the Bills are the Killingholme Wharf Company and the Immingham Storage Company. Apparently these are subsidiaries of the Central Oil Refinery Company. We are led to believe that it is a promoter because it is named in the Bill. Those companies are subsidiaries of the Chemicals and Oil Storage Management Company, which in turn is a subsidiary of Simon Storage Group Ltd., which is a subsidiary of Simon Engineering and members of the Simon Group. The Simon Group is a massive multi-million pound company that obviously has interests in all manner of things. Added to that, we have heard that there is a partnership involved—a partnership between the various companies that I have just mentioned and a company called B.V. Schieveem, a Dutch company, which in turn is a subsidiary of a company by the name of Van Ommeron UK, which is a subsidiary of Van Ommeron Ceteco.

These are just a few of the companies whose names have been linked with the North Killingholme Cargo Terminal Bill, either as promoters or subsidiaries of promoters. I understand from my reading of the Committee proceedings that still further companies are involved in the Bill. It is extremely difficult to keep track of all the companies, particularly as only two of them are mentioned in the Bill. I suggest that both the Bills should not be carried over into the next Session until the House receives some information as to the exact identity of the promoters, some exact reference to their relationship with other companies involved in the promotion of the Bill, and some identification of the foreign element and foreign input in the Bill, which is not even mentioned. Nowhere in the North Killingholme Cargo Terminal Bill is Van Ommeron mentioned. I venture the opinion that the promoters of the Bill are happy to maintain that confusion.

Mr. Michael Brown: The hon. Gentleman has referred to confusion, which I freely concede occurred in Committee one day last week. If he wants to be sure about the full reason why there was that confusion, all he has to do is to get hold of a transcript of the proceedings of last Thursday, and he will see a statement by the promoters' principal witness which clearly shows, certainly to the satisfaction of the Committee, exactly what happened. A number of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends were in the Public Gallery with me. It was a straightforward matter that was put before the Committee.

Mr. Redmond: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. How can the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) prejudge what the Committee will decide unless he is privy to information that I do not have?

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is to do with the debate, not the Chair.

Mr. Illsley: I appreciate the comments made by the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown). I have considered the Committee proceedings in some detail and tried to elicit the true identity of the companies involved. I believe that I am getting closer and closer, but every day more and more companies are introduced. The Bills are unclear about the identity of the companies involved and silent about the international involvement, so perhaps they should be taken away and redrafted, either next Session or in a later Session, so that this information can be provided.

Mr. Michael Welsh: We still cannot find out who is the owner. Are we to allow a compulsory purchase order to be applied when we do not know who desires it?

Mr. Illsley: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. As I pointed out on Second Reading, the Bill seeks to grant not only powers of compulsory purchase but powers to dump into the River Humber. Furthermore, the power to delegate those powers to successor companies is to be granted. The Bill is designed to allow the company at the end of the chain to disguise its operation completely and to hide its intentions regarding the works on the River Humber.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) referred earlier to the Chairman of the Committee. I am pleased that the hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) is in his place, as he is the Chairman of the Committee. However, he is also the parliamentary consultant to the British Chemical Engineering Contractors Association.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: The hon. Members for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) and for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) have now called into question the integrity of one of my colleagues who, by parliamentary convention, is unable to rise in his own defence. My hon. Friend, who fought Ilkeston a few years ago, was born and brought up in Nottinghamshire and is sympathetic to many of the comments made by Nottinghamshire colleagues on this side of the House, so criticism of him is misplaced.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. As was explained earlier, the Examiners are perfectly satisfied with the chairmanship of that Committee and that the documents were signed in accordance with propriety. The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) should not continue to refer to that matter.

Mr. Illsley: I wish to clear up one or two points that were raised in that last exchange. I am not calling into question the integrity of the hon. Member for Rochford. That has been done, but not by me. The multiplicity of companies involved in the Bill place the hon. Gentleman in a position of some embarrassment because, in his capacity as parliamentary consultant to the British Chemical Engineering Contractors Association, it is possible that, without his knowledge, he could be compromised by an application by any of those companies. [Interruption.] I was not seeking to call into question the hon. Gentleman's integrity, but simply to point out that he might have been compromised without his knowledge.

There are other reasons why the Bill should not be carried over into the next Session and why the motion should be rejected this evening. The Bills will enable the ports to handle coal. The evidence before the Committee confirms that fact. The Bills will simply increase the number of coal imports down the River Humber and the total number of imports into this country when British Coal is about to break even at the end of this financial year. We hope that British Coal is about to wipe out a considerable deficit and be profitable by next April. The corporation must be profitable next year because the Secretary of State has intimated that he will sell it off and privatise the industry. Obviously, he cannot do that unless it is profitable.

We should be promoting British coal, rather than improving the facilities for importing coal into this country. It has been stated that about 30 million tonnes of coal come into this country. I would place that figure about 20 million tonnes higher. The CEGB estimate of 30 million tonnes was made in 1986. That estimate has now been revised to 50 million tonnes.

We must also bear in mind the forthcoming privatisation of the electricity supply industry. That will have a considerable effect on the coal industry and will also bear some relation to these Bills. Those responsible for generating electricity will be able to cash in on the Secretary of State's assertions that, when the electricity industry is privatised, they will be able to purchase coal from whatever source they see fit.

The influx of imported coal will increase world prices and remove the very advantage that the Bills are seeking to secure. The British coal industry will be damaged and pressure will be brought to bear on our balance of payments, which is in a sorry state already. By the end of the century our increased electricity requirements will mean that we shall need more coal-fired power stations. These stations should be fuelled by British coal, not imported coal.

Statements have been made this week and last week to the effect that we need more nuclear power stations. Those assertions have been dismissed by the Department of Energy. Instead, we shall be looking to smaller coal-fired power stations. The nuclear power industry will suffer from the privatisation of the electricity supply industry. The Government have decided to withdraw funding for two research projects into the fast breeder reactor and the fission programme. Nuclear power will be unattractive to investors in future; hence the need to place a 20 per cent. ring fence around it.

British Coal should be encouraged in its efforts to achieve profitability. It appears to be Opposition Members who are promoting a "buy British" or "support Britain" policy.

Mr. Redmond: Does my hon. Friend agree that those of us who are seeking to promote the interests of British Coal and the British people are patriotic and that those who are seeking to promote foreign interests are less patriotic?

Mr. Illsley: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend.

A multiplicity of companies and a huge range of facilities lie behind the proposals that are set out in the Bills. There is a fear that there could be a turnkey contract. For example, Simon Engineering and its subsidiaries could build a power station on the Killingholme site—it has already been identified by the CEGB as a possible site for a power station—and that could encourage imports. That could result in many companies becoming involved in the building and running of a power station that would use imported coal.

9.33 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): We have heard eloquent speeches by Conservative Members in support of the motion. The Minister has not uttered one word during the debate——

Mr. Michael Brown: Perhaps my hon. Friend's silence could be described as one of the best speeches of the evening.

Mr. Lloyd: It is the best speech that we have heard from the Government Dispatch Box.

If the Minister does not intend to make any comment about the merits of the Bill or those of the motion, perhaps he will clarify whether the Government are supporting the Bill, or whether they are neutral. Will we not see any member of the payroll vote supporting the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown)? Would the Minister care to intervene to tell the House where the Government stand? Whenever private Bills come before the House, the Government speak the language of neutrality while voting in support of the promoters, such as the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes and his South African friends. If the Minister wishes to intervene now, I shall be happy to let him do so.

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Michael Portillo): The hon. Gentleman is right to ask about the Government's views on the carry-over motion. The Government believe that the motion should be supported. That will provide the opportunity for this important Bill to continue to be discussed.

Mr. Lloyd: Let me remind the Minister of what the Joint Select Committee on Private Bill Procedure said about carry-over motions. Members of the Minister's party as well as mine were on the Committee. The report concluded that, in principle, private Bills, like public Bills, must obtain Royal Assent within a single Session of Parliament to become law. The report quotes from the Chairman of Committees, who considered that in recent years the carry-over facility has come to be abused. It says:

"He thought it right that a bill should be carried over if its progress is being impeded for reasons unconnected with its merits"——

Mr. Michael Brown: It is.

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman should listen carefully. If, as he has said, the Bill's promoters and he are in full agreement with the report, I hope that he will withdraw his support for the motion.

"if a private bill is so controversial that progress cannot be made on it (or is not being made on it because the promoters are trying to avoid a long drawn-out Committee stage). I question whether it is reasonable for it to continue from Session to Session".

The Committee recognised the concern of the Chairman of Committees that the facility should not be abused, and it recognised that it was being abused when Bills were politically contentious, as this one is. The Committee recommended:

"henceforth it should only be in the most exceptional circumstances that a private bill should be allowed to continue its passage through Parliament for more than two Sessions. A private bill should be expected to complete its progress within a single Session".

That is in black and white in the report that the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes claimed to support. It he has any integrity, he will now tell the House that he accepts that the motion is inappropriate. But he has no intention of doing that, or of supporting the report.

Mr. Michael Brown: I did not put down the motion. It appeared this morning on the Order Paper in the name of the Chairman of Ways and Means. I saw it, thought that it was a good idea and spoke in favour of it.

Mr. Lloyd: Even at this late stage, I feel confident that if the promoters of the Bill said that they were withdrawing their support, the Chairman of Ways and Means would not wish to continue with the motion. The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes can help us by telling his hon. Friends that the carry-over will be opposed, not only by the few who are afraid of constituency majorities in Nottingham, but those like the Minister, who supported the Bill on Second Reading, and his Front-Bench colleagues of the time.

The same applies to the Prime Minister, who is at the centre of this expedition. It must be unprecedented for any Prime Minister of any Government to use the full might of parliamentary procedure to force through a Bill that will do so much damage to British jobs in the mining community for so much gain for the private speculators and the foreign coal industry.

The Government are determined to reward their South African friends. The Prime Minister's Ten o'clock motion allows this private business to "be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour."

For the Prime Minister to be present to support the Bill and force it through by procedural means is a scandal. The Bill is massively contentious politically. All my hon. Friends who have spoken have done so on behalf of their communities and the jobs that will be decimated if the Bill is passed. We have heard nothing from Conservative Members, even the Nottingham apologists, about the real interests affected by the Bill.

No Labour Member has walked through the Division Lobby in support of the Bill, while the overwhelming majority of Conservatives have done so. We are used to watching the honourable hypocrites on the Conservative Benches walking through the Lobby, or threatening to—

Mr. Michael Brown: The hon. Gentleman used the words "honourable hypocrites" about Conservative Members. I think that that is unparliamentary.—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I want to answer the point of order. Although the term "hypocrite" is one that I deprecate, when used in general it is acceptable according to the practice of the House.

Mr. Lloyd: I place on record the fact that I, too, deprecate the term "hypocrite". The Opposition are a little tired of listening to Conservative Members with their bleeding hearts, pretending that they have a conscience, when they feel that there is an electoral advantage. However, we see those same hon. Gentlemen prepared to vote to get rid of child benefit, to vote to keep this Government in power and to vote on any other issue that tramples on the jobs and interests of the people whom the Opposition represent. We are used to seeing those hon. Gentlemen do that, so we will take no lessons from them, under any circumstances.

This debate goes to the core of the distinction between the two political parties. My hon. Friends have consistently supported and spoken in favour of the maintenance of jobs in the coal mining industry and of jobs in industries far wider afield. My constituency has a long tradition of engineering, and it used to supply switchgear equipment to the mining industry. That switchgear industry has been decimated because of the failure of the Government to invest in our native industry. When Conservative Members are prepared to see, not just the destruction of jobs, in the mining industry, in the transport industry and in the engineering industry, but the destruction of whole communities, we are entitled to ask whose side they are on.

The report of the Joint Select Committee on Private Bill Procedure talked about the need for an environmental impact assessment. It came out on Second Reading that the constituency of the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes will have rumbling through its streets 800 extra lorries every day. I believe that that is a suitable subject for the sort of environmental impact study recommended by the Select Committee.

There are all the arguments in the world for the Bill not being carried over, such as that the Joint Select Committee's report can be debated, so that we can have the environmental impact study and determine whether that is the proper way forward. The constituents of the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes are entitled to the sort of protection, which would be given as a result of that study, but which is not being given to them by their Member of Parliament.

Mr. Michael Brown: The Labour-controlled Humberside county council commissioned a study by Coopers and Lybrand when my constituency was threatened with the possibility of nuclear waste being disposed there. It was a Labour authority that commissioned that study with a view to suggesting that there might be alternative uses for the land around the CEGB site that was to be nominated for nuclear waste disposal. The Humberside Labour-controlled county council backed the report, which recommended that there should be an improvement in dock facilities. On those grounds, the hon. Gentleman's party should disagree with the environmental impact study that he has just recommended.

Mr. Lloyd: I was referring to the recommendation made in the report of the Joint Select Committee, which the hon. Gentleman has already said he supports.

If I can go beyond the area covered by the hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes, why can we not have an employment impact study? Why should we not have a proper study of the employment consequences of the Bill? Opposition Members have already said that 76,000 jobs in the mining industry and countless jobs outside that industry will be affected by the Bill. Why should the House not have an acceptable assessment of the employment impact, and not just the pious hope of the 100 jobs that the hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West (Mr. Bellingham) mentioned? I accept that the 100 jobs in King's Lynn are valuable, but they cannot be weighed in the balance against the 76,000 jobs that my hon. Friends have sought to defend tonight.

We gave the hon. Member for Norfolk, North-West the opportunity to come out of the debate with dignity when we told him that he could have a Bill that would help his port. However, instead of wanting to pursue the interests of his port and the interests of my hon. Friends, the hon. Gentleman chose to support the interests of the South African coal industry and those of his hon. Friends.

Mr. Cunliffe: The hon. Gentleman has been paid off.

Mr. Lloyd: As my hon. Friend has said, there may have been some sort of pay-off. I do not know, because, of course, we are used to a Government who reward their members through the political patronage system.

The impact of the Bill is far too great to allow it to be carried over tonight. We should accept the recommendations of the Joint Select Committee, which suggest that the carry-over motion is totally inappropriate. For that reason, I shall support my hon. Friends in their opposition to it.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): We have spent some three and a half hours debating the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill and six hours on the North Killingholme Cargo Terminal Bill. The House has had the opportunity to consider both sides of the argument. After a long deliberation, the House decided to give the Bills a Second Reading and they were referred to a Committee. They have been dealt with most assiduously by that Committee, and I am sure that my hon. Friends would like me to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) for the work that he has done on that Committee.

I believe that nothing will be gained by voting down the carry-over motions tonight. All that would happen is that the Bills would go back to square one. I appreciate that the Neanderthal elements on the Opposition Benches, who are opposed to free trade at any cost, are using every parliamentary tactic in the book—filibustering and so on—to defeat the Bills.

We believe that the Bills should be given a fair wind. We believe that it is only right and fair that those people who wish to oppose the Bills should go to the Committee and petition it. Under the assiduous chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford, both sides of the argument will be heard. That is the fair and right way. It is not right for Labour Members to try to use parliamentary tactics to defeat the Bills. The House has made its decision that the Bills should go to Committee.

In support of the North Killingholme Cargo Terminal Bill I believe that I can do no better than quote the words of my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown). I am sure that the House would want to pay tribute to him for the fair, careful and highly intelligent manner in which he introduced it.

Opposition Members continually state that North Killingholme will be used to import South African coal, but that is a red herring. On 22 June 1988, my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes said:

"The import and export traffic will be in bulk commodities, which include grain"—[Official Report, 22 June 1988; Vol. 135, c. 1183.]

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for people who obviously received favours from the South African Government to participate in this debate? It is clear that certain Conservative Members have had buckshee trips to South Africa.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is perfectly in order for an hon. Member who wishes to be called to stand.

Mr. Leigh: That intervention was irrelevant to my speech, but let me make it clear that I have received no favours from the South African Government.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I understand your ruling about hon. Members wishing to speak, which is perfectly correct, but if the House votes, a different issue arises. "Erskine May" points out that Members cannot vote if they have a direct pecuniary interest.

The Register of Members' Interests, drawn up by a Select Committee appointed by this House, includes in its requirements all trips paid for by outside organisations that are not in the service of this House. Several Conservative Members have been to South Africa, paid for by the South African Government. The Bill could give facilities for the importation of South African coal.

I believe that there is a clear link between the effects of the Bill and the benefits that some hon. Members have gained from the South African Government. Therefore, in the light of the ruling from a previous Speaker when a private Bill was being promoted in favour of Lloyd's, I believe that hon. Members should bear their interests in mind and refrain from voting.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have no doubt that hon. Members will bear that in mind, and that if they have any interests they will be honourable and declare them.

Mr. Leigh: I have absolutely no interest in this Bill except that it will benefit my constituents who have witnessed the revival of north Lincolnshire under this Government. They have seen unemployment cut. They have seen inflation cut. They have seen new prosperity come to our area. That is why I support the Bill. That is why I want more trade. That is why my farmers want more grain to be exported. It is typical that Opposition Members should always take a narrow, negative and old-fashioned view. The Conservatives have confidence and faith in our ability to export from this port. Why do Opposition Members always assume that we shall import South African coal? Why are they so worried about our ability to beat the world in its free markets?

This is a fine Bill, which will be carefully considered by my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford and the Committee. If the Opposition think that they have a case —they have not—they can take their argument to my hon. Friend. Why are they using filibustering tactics and raising irrelevant points of order? Perhaps they do not have the confidence in their own case.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): Does my hon. Friend agree that it might be difficult if an hon. Member participating in the debate was sponsored by a mining union, when Opposition Members have drawn attention to other hon. Members' interests?

Mr. Leigh: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. Opposition Members in glasshouses should not throw stones. They have all been trooping into the debate. Why, for once, do we see such a high turnout of Labour Members? Does it have anything to do with the Bill's merits? No, they are all in the pockets of Arthur Scargill. I know what the country thinks of Arthur Scargill—the people have no time for him.

The Bill will go through on its merits. It will receive the full support of the House of Commons. It will bring prosperity to the area that I and my hon. Friend the Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes represent. I recommend it to my hon. Friends.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The Question is the motion on the Order Paper.

As many as are of that opinion say Aye.

To the contrary No.

Hon Members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think that the Noes have it.

Hon. Members: Aye.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Clear the Lobbies.

Question put:

The House proceeded to a Division:

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras) (seated and covered): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Today, we have had a lot of talk about tapes. If anyone listens to the tape of this debate, it will be absolutely clear beyond doubt that at the appropriate point there was no cry of "Aye"—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. If I am to be heard, I ask hon. Members to listen. A Division is now in progress.

The House having divided: Ayes 212, Noes 157.

Copyright, Designs and Patents Bill
[Lords]

Lords Amendments to Commons Amendments, consequential Amendments made by the Lords and Lords Amendments in lieu of certain Commons Amendments, considered.

Clause 18

INFRINGEMENT BY ISSUE OF COPIES TO THE PUBLIC

The Lords have disagreed to the amendments made by the Commons:

In page 9, line 4, leave out

', except as mentioned in subsection (3),'.

In page 9, line 8, leave out 'their importation' and insert 'any subsequent importation of those copies'.

In page 9, line 9, leave out from beginning to 'relation' and insert 'except that in'.

In page 9, line 10, leave out 'hiring' and insert 'rental'.

but have proposed the following amendment in lieu thereof:

No. 1, in page 9, line 3, leave out subsections (2) and (3) and insert—

'(2) References in this Part to the issue to the public of copies of a work are to the act of putting into circulation copies not previously put into circulation, in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, and not to—

(a) any subsequent distribution, sale, hiring or loan of those copies, or

(b) any subsequent importation of those copies into the United Kingdom; except that in relation to sound recordings, films and computer programs the restricted act of issuing copies to the public includes any rental of copies to the public.'

10.18 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Eric Forth): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I should be much obliged if hon. Members leaving the Chamber did so quietly, so that we can hear the Minister explain these important amendments.

Mr. Forth rose—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I wonder whether conversations could be carried out on the other side of the swing doors, please.

Mr. Forth: It would be inappropriate for the House to linger at length on these matters. They have been dealt with in detail in both Houses and we are here to consider the largely technical and clarificatory measures that the other place has brought to bear on this important matter.

I shall outline briefly the intention behind each amendment. Amendment No. 1 seeks to improve the drafting and makes it clear that if copies have been issued to the public overseas, importation and putting copies in circulation in the United Kingdom is not a restricted act.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby) rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: I call the hon. Gentleman on the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): My hon. Friend used to be on television.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: It is a pity, Madam Deputy Speaker, that you did not reside in the Yorkshire Television viewing area.

We have a full House for the class reunion of the Committee and those who sat through the earlier stages of the Bill, but we are minus the prefect. It is an interesting augury for the Minister and myself that the two Front Bench spokesmen in the earlier arguments have gone on to meteoric rises within their respective parties. We are now beginning to tread the same path as tail-end Charlies, perhaps with the emphasis on Charlie.

The Labour party will not oppose the Bill or talk at length. We welcome the general principle of the revision of the copyright legislation. We broadly support the Bill. There are one or two things that we would have liked to change and which we tried strenuously to change at earlier stages. For instance, we would have liked to change the rights of journalists and design rights. Those arguments are now over. We would have liked the Government to make more concessions to the House of Lords. They could have afforded to throw a few crumbs from a rather crumby table, but they did not. That means that we do not have much on which to bite. In fact, if we were to make a meal of it, it would be anorexia nervosa turned into a system of debate. We are simply cleaning up and polishing the final Lords amendments, which in the main we are happy to accept.

Amendment No. 1 attracted the only Division in the other place and, unfortunately, we lost by 10 votes. We wanted to extend rights to authors as well as producers, but that argument is now behind us.

The issue is one of definition. I would call it a "Spycatcher" definition. The Government have a certain amount of expertise in things that have been imported and sold before they have been published. They have wasted much money in developing their knowledge of that. Lord Young of Graffham, Saatchi and Thomson explained the amendment eloquently and we cannot see any objection to it. We shall bow to the wisdom of the noble Lord and his representative on earth.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 70

PROVISION OF SUB-TITLED COPIES OF BROADCAST OR CABLE PROGRAMME

The Lords have agreed to the amendment made by the Commons:

In page 26, line 1, leave out subsection (1) and insert—

'(1) A designated body may, for the purpose of providing people who are deaf or hard of hearing with copies which are sub-titled or othewise modified for their special needs, makes copies of television broadcasts or cable programmes and issue copies to the public, without infringing any copyright in the broadcasts or cable programmes or works included in them.'.

with the following amendment:

No. 2, in line 3, after 'hearing', insert—

', or physically or mentally handicapped in other ways,'.

Mr. Forth: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this we will consider Lords amendment No. 14, to the Commons amendment to schedule 2.

Mr. Forth: These amendments tabled by Lord Williams and accepted by the Government, extend to other physically and mentally handicapped people the benefit of the exceptions in clause 70 and paragraph 17 of schedule 2, which allow subtitling of recordings of broadcasts for deaf people. This is an important measure, and we hope that the House will give its approval.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: It is a little churlish for the Minister to introduce the amendment in that fashion. He might have commemorated the great Labour triumph in the House of Lords in forcing the Government to accept this obvious and sensible concession by widening the clause to all physically and mentally handicapped people. It would have been ludicrous if videos for autistic children had not been included.

It is interesting to note that the Government did not include that in the first place, but had to be forced to include it by our amendment in the House of Lords. There was no vote on the issue because the Government knew that they would be beaten in a place where, at least until today, bleeding hearts had some strength. The physically and mentally handicapped are well represented in the other place. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"] I support the amendment and pay tribute to Lord Williams of Elvel and to the Opposition in the House of Lords, who tabled the amendment in the first place.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 109

ORDER AS TO DISPOSAL OF INFRINGING COPY OR OTHER ARTICLE

The Lords have agreed to the amendment made by the Commons:

To insert a second new clause in place of clause 109:

' .—(1) Where an infringing copy or other article has been delivered up in pursuance of an order under section 94 or 104, or has been seized and detained in pursuance of the right conferred by section 95, an application may be made to the court—

(a) for an order that it shall be forfeited to the copyright owner or destroyed or otherwise dealt with as the court may think fit, or

(b) for a decision that no such order should be made.

(2) In considering what order (if any) should be made, the court shall consider whether other remedies available in an action for infringement of copyright would be adequate to compensate the copyright owner and to protect his interests.

(3) Provision shall be made by rules of court as to the service of notice on persons having an interest in the copy or other article, and any such person is entitled—

(a) to appear in proceedings for an order under this section, whether or not he was served with notice, and

(b) to appeal against any order made, whether or not he appeared;

and an order shall not take effect until the end of the period within which notice of an appeal may be given or, if before the end of that period notice of appeal is duly given, until the final determination or abandonment of the proceedings on the appeal.

(4) Where there is more than one person interested in a copy or other article, the court shall make such order as it thinks just and may (in particular) direct that the article be sold, or otherwise dealt with, and the proceeds divided.

(5) If the court decides that no order should be made under this section, the person in whose possession, custody or control the copy or other article was before being delivered up or seized is entitled to its return.

(6) References in this section to a person having an interest in a copy or other article include any person in whose favour an order could be made in respect of it under this section or under section (Order as to disposal of illicit recordings) or (Order as to disposal of infringing article, &c.)

of this Act or section 58BA of the Trade Marks Act 1938 (which make similar provision in relation to infringement of rights in performances, design right and trade marks).'

with the following amendment:

No. 3, leave out subsection (1) and insert—

'(1) An application may be made to the court for an order that an infringement copy of other article delivered up in pursuance of an order under section 94 or 104, or seized and detained in pursuance of the right conferred by section 95, shall be)—

(a) forfeited to the copyright owner, or

(b) destroyed or otherwise dealt with as the court may think fit, or for a decision that no such order should be made.'

Mr. Forth: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider Lords amendments Nos. 8 and 9.

Mr. Forth: The amendments mean that an application for a forfeiture order need not await successful execution of an order for delivery up.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Once again we support the principle of the amendment. It is right that we should provide a procedure for forfeiture in these cases and that it should be quick, efficient and enforceable. The amendments move in that direction.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 8 and 9 agreed to.

Clause 111

SCOPE OF GENERAL CONTROL OF LICENSING SCHEMES

The Lords have agreed to the amendment made by the Commons:

In page 46, line 17, leave out 'general control' and insert 'references and applications with respect to'

with the following amendment:

No. 4, in line 1, after 'control', insert 'of'.

Mr. Forth: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider Lords amendments Nos. 5, 6 and 7.

Mr. Forth: These amendments replace an amendment that was agreed to in the Commons on Report, despite drafting defects, as a procedural device to ensure an opportunity for further parliamentary consideration. It was made clear that, although the Government were sympathetic to the intention of the amendment moved by an all-party group on behalf of registered clubs, the amendment was unlikely to be acceptable as it stood. I think that this amendment will go all the way to giving the clubs what they wanted.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: The Minister glossed over what looks like some incompetence in the drafting of the legislation. It is fairly typical of the Government that they are so obsessed with a certain type of control that they do not exert proper control over drafting of legislation. However, we shall let that pass, because the amendments are technical.

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, South): In my printed copy there seems to be a typographical error in amendment No. 4(5). I think that the word "included" should read "concluded". Perhaps the Minister would like to comment on that.

Mr. Forth: I assume that it is a typographical error. The intention is as the hon. Gentleman suggests.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Perhaps I could draw the attention of the hon. Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran) to the list of corrections.

Amendment agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 5 to 7 agreed to.

New Clause

CROWN USE OF REGISTERED DESIGN: COMPENSATION FOR LOSS OF PROFIT.

The Lords have agreed to the amendment made by the Commons:

To insert a second new clause after clause 252:

' .—(1) In Schedule 1 to the Registered Designs Act 1949 (Crown use), after paragraph 2 insert—

"Compensation for loss of profit.

2A.—(1) Where Crown use is made of a registered design, the government department concerned shall pay—

(a) to the registered proprietor, or

(b) if there is an exclusive licence in force in respect of the design, to the exclusive licensee, compensation for any loss resulting from his not being awarded a contract to supply the articles to which the design is applied.

(2) Compensation is payable only to the extent that such a contract could have been fulfilled from his existing manufacturing capacity; but is payable notwithstanding the existence of circumstances rendering him ineligible for the award of such a contract.

(3) In determining the loss, regard shall be had to the profit which would have been made on such a contract and to the extent to which any manufacturing capacity was under-used.

(4) No compensation is payable in respect of any failure to secure contracts for the supply of articles to which the design is applied otherwise than for the services of the Crown.

(5) The amount payable under this paragraph shall, if not agreed between the registered proprietor or licensee and the government department concerned with the approval of the Treasury, be determined by the court on a reference under paragraph 3; and it is in addition to any amount payable under paragraph 1 or 2 of this Schedule.

(6) In this paragraph—

'Crown use', in relation to a design, means the doing of anything by virtue of paragraph 1 which would otherwise be an infringement of the right in the design; and 'the government department concerned', in relation to such use, means the government department who or on whose authority the act was done.".

(2) In paragraph 3 of that Schedule (reference of disputes as to Crown use) for sub-paragraph (1) substitute—

"(1) Any dispute as to—

(a) the exercise by a Government department, or a person authorised by a Government department, of the powers conferred by paragraph 1 of this Schedule,

(b) terms for the use of a design for the services of the Crown under that paragraph,

(c) the right of any person to receive any part of a payment made under paragraph 1(3), or

(d) the right of any person to receive a payment under paragraph 2A, may be referred to the court by either party to the dispute.".

(3) The above amendments apply in relation to any Crown use of a registered design after the commencement of this section, even if the terms for such use were settled before commencement.

with the following amendment:

No. 10, in line 38, leave out 'who' and insert 'by whom'.

Mr. Forth: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendments.

Madam Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider Lords amendments Nos. 11, 12, 13, 15 and 16.

Mr. Forth: Proceedings have been overlengthy, and it would be inappropriate for me to go into detail on these amendments. I assure the House that they are all technical. I shall provide detail if necessary, but I think that the House can accept the amendments as improvements to the Bill.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I would be filibustering if I replied to the Minister, but that vicious personal attack on me for dragging out the proceedings of the House after the Minister's lengthy contributions is bitterly resented.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 11 to 16 agreed to.

Scottish Salmon Netting Industry

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

10.30 pm

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): In initiating this Adjournment debate on the subject of the Scottish salmon netting industry, I declare a nominal and, I hope, temporary interest in this industry, and make it clear that neither I nor my family derive any income from any form of fishery.

I am grateful for this opportunity to debate the fate of a small traditional rural industry in Scotland, which used to employ directly over 1,500 on a regular seasonal basis. I fear that the salmon netting industry is being systematically destroyed by blatantly discriminatory action by the Government, combined with inappropriate dealings by what is supposed to be a charitable trust. This is an example of the shameless promotion by the Government and the rest of the establishment of the interests of a group of influential landowners, regardless of the rights of small netting businesses and their employees. These are the points that I wish to expose during this debate.

The lawful salmon netting industry has provided seasonal employment in rural communities on the estuaries of our main rivers since time immemorial. Netsmen have been subject to detailed regulations to prevent overfishing, and the industry has operated side by side with angling interests for centuries without any suggestion that the nets were a threat to the survival of the wild salmon. My understanding was that, even recently, nets have been taking only about 15 per cent. of available stocks.

Apart from the direct contribution of about 1,500 regular seasonal jobs to the rural community, the traditional net and coble fishing technique has been an attractive feature of the lower reaches of our rivers from the Borders right up to Caithness. It is part of the local tourist attraction in many of these areas. This industry is disappearing rapidly, as a result of a two-pronged attack involving sabotage by the Government, on the one hand, and, on the other, acquisitions by the Atlantic Salmon Conservation Trust (Scotland), which has the unlikely charitable objective of destroying this perfectly legitimate industry.

I suspect that the Minister will accuse me of attacking rod fishermen and seeking to frustrate a conservation initiative, so let me deal with those two points straight away. There is an urgent need for action to conserve salmon. Salmon stocks have suffered grievously as a result of several factors. They have been hit by increased fishing at sea at various points between Greenland and Northumberland; they are suffering from the ravages of disease and pollution; and there is no question but that illegal netting with fixed monofilament gear is taking a heavy toll.

There would be overwhelming justification for taking effective action to deal with any of those problems, and I would be interested to know whether the Government or the new Salmon Advisory Committee have come up with any ideas or initiatives to deal with those problems. I note, incidentally, that the Salmon Advisory Committee's paper on information on the status of salmon stocks, which was published only last month, simply confirms that the available information is next to useless.

I have the impression that very little is happening to conserve salmon. The Government have copped out on the positive suggestion of a tagging scheme, and I fear that the proposed dealer licensing scheme will be little more than a window-dressing exercise. All this pressure to be seen to be doing something about salmon conservation has focused, totally irrationally, on the unfortunate legal netsmen. The fact that they are not a significant part of the problem is evidently not important. They are a small and dispersed group of seasonal workers who can be picked off easily. Significantly, their removal leads to an immediate financial return for the proprietors of valuable upstream rod fishing beats.

I turn now to the matter of the rights of rod fishermen and the value of the tourist industry. The Labour party is strongly committed to promoting the interests of anglers. Unlike the Government, we want to see initiatives to promote public access to fishing on the rivers of Scotland. We also recognise the value and potential of the tourist industry. However, the destruction of the legal netting industry has nothing to do with those objectives. It is simply designed to further inflate charges for salmon fishing, which will make the sport even more exclusive. There is little room for more anglers on our main rivers. They will have to pay more to the landowners. The fact that so many of those landowners are absentees will minimise any benefit to the local economy.

The hypocrisy of those people who want to shut down the nets in the interests of conservation is graphically exposed when the self-same people want to extend their lucrative rod fishing season on rivers such as the Dee, regardless of the fact they will be taking fish that are on the point of spawning.

I turn now to the Government's rather squalid part in these affairs. Ministers have evidently been persuaded by influential friends to initiate a series of measures to strengthen the position of rod fishing proprietors against all other interests, and particularly against the netsmen. First, the Salmon Act 1986 entrenched the rights of proprietors, despite Opposition efforts to promote the public interest. Then, earlier this year, the Government imposed new regulations to reduce the catch at netting stations by 20 per cent. by extending the weekly close time to 60 hours, although opposition to that measure came not only from Opposition Members, but, significantly, from the right hon. Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith).

The next threat is to introduce drastic changes to permitted netting techniques to make it even more difficult for netsmen to make a living. These blatantly discriminatory measures have already had drastic effects on the number of small netting businesses. They could be described as a form of expropriation without compensation, because that has been the effect on some of those small businesses.

All these Government initiatives are given spurious justification by referring to the need for conservation. In Committee, the Minister went round and round the issue and, in the end, said:

"The mortality rates of salmon in the open sea are increasing."

He went on to urge the Committee to support

"a precautionary measure to reduce the exploitation of salmon in home waters."—[Official Report, Second Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. 4 May 1988; c. 25.]

We should note the logic of that. There is a problem out on the high seas, so the Government take action in the rivers.

I pressed the Minister further on that matter when I put a parliamentary question to him on 18 May. I asked

"if he will place in the Library any scientific evidence which is available to him concerning the effect of legal netting operations on salmon stocks in Scottish rivers; and if he will review the weekly close time for such operations before the start of the 1989 season in the light of such evidence."

The reply from the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth), came with characteristic bluntness. He said:

"No. The scientific evidence available to the Government reflected the outcome of research and monitoring work on the state of salmon stocks in Scotland and was discussed in the course of the consideration of the weekly close time regulations by the Second Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments on 4 May. The Government have no plans for a further review of weekly close time for salmon net fishing in Scotland."—[Official Report, 18 May 1988; Vol. 133, c. 469-70.]

The refusal to publish the scientific case against legal netsmen may well mean that the evidence is either unconvincing or, as I suspect, non-existent.

This softening-up operation carried out by the Government, combined with falling fish stocks and lower market prices, has made salmon netsmen an easy prey for predators such as the Atlantic Salmon Conservation Trust. It is a strange coincidence that the Crown Estate Commissioners have chosen this moment in history to sell off their 150 tenanted netting stations. In present circumstances, tenants cannot aford to buy their netting stations, and even those who can afford to do so have not been given the opportunity by the Crown Estate Commissioners.

We do not know to whom the commissioners will be prepared to sell those fisheries, but I wonder whether the Atlantic Salmon Conservation Trust will be involved, either directly or indirectly, in any of those deals. I note, incidentally, that the chairman of the Crown Estate Commissioners, the Earl of Mansfield, who was at some time a Minister of State, Scottish Office, is being paid £8,500 a year by the Tay river board not to work his fisheries at Scone on the Tay. We have the flavour of what is going on there.

The Atlantic Salmon Conservation Trust is a shady organisation which evidently has access to large sums of money. It set up shop in 1985 and spent £83,000 that year on acquiring and extinguishing netting rights. In 1986, the figure was £460,269, and in 1987 it was £828,663, which may or may not include £286,000 of forward commitments for 1988. Total spending on the purchase of netting rights up to March 1988 came to almost £1·25 million on several rivers. These included the Spey, the Deveron, the Dee, the Don, the Alness, the Conon, the Beauly, the Ness, the Nairn, the Findhorn, the Lossie, the Tweed and the Solway.

There is an interesting twist to the trust's operations on the Solway. It spent £234,200 on buying fisheries, and I gather from an answer that I received last week from the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces that his Department stumped up £135,000 of that sum to help the trust to buy the Loch and Dornock fishery. I find that a surprising use of taxpayers' money. I also find it a surprising price to pay for what seems to be a modest property. I wonder whether someone somewhere received a backhander. I think that we should know more about that.

In the course of these wheelings and dealings there has been no compensation for tenant netsmen whose businesses have been sabotaged by the extension of close time. There is no provision for working netsmen who lose their jobs. As seasonal workers, they have no right to redundancy payments. They merely discover during the close season that their jobs have disappeared following secret negotiations with the trust. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) will know that in his area there was an interesting variation on the theme. A rather colourful group of English international cricketers took over the ailing Berwick Salmon Fishing Company, only to strip its assets and sell it to the trust in a matter of months.

The main objective of the trust is to destroy the netting industry, which, rather surprisingly, has been accepted by the Inland Revenue as a charitable purpose. The upstream proprietors can invest in manoeuvres that enhance the value of their properties with the advantage of charitable tax relief. The sources of the trust's massive finances have been a closely guarded secret, but its agents on the Borders blew the gaffe in a letter to Tweed proprietors dated 23 August. The Duke of Roxburghe, no less, wrote:

"As all the Tweed proprietors, and proprietors of all the main tributaries are likely to benefit enormously over the course of the next few years from the removal of the bulk of the netting presence and the subsequent control of the Tweed salmon stocks for conservation, it would be nice to think that all proprietors interested in salmon conservation would contribute to the ASCT(S), possibly in proportion to their assessable value."

Isn't that nice? The duke was appealing for a cool £600,000 over two years. The terms of the letter make it clear that contributions towards the enterprise will by no stretch of the imagination be charitable donations. They will be commercial investments and should be treated accordingly. I understand that a similar levy system is proposed for the Tay.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the duke even had the gall to appeal to the local authorities, whose ratepayers had been put out of work by the actions of the trust, to finance these activities? The response was pretty cool.

Mr. Home Robertson: I am aware of that. That shows the brass neck that these people have. I am grateful to the duke for exposing the hypocrisy and thoroughly corrupt nature of what is taking place, perhaps inadvertently.

I have written to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and to the Inland Revenue office in Edinburgh to draw attention to this abuse of charitable status. I have demanded retrospective action to recover charitable tax relief from the organisation. I have received no substantive reply to my correspondence. I shall be grateful if the Minister can confirm that the charitable status of the trust is being reviewed in the light of this damning evidence.

I suppose that it can be argued that those who are hostile to legitimate netsmen, for whatever reason, are entitled to buy and extinguish netting rights by free-market transactions, but it is obscene for people who stand to gain directly from such developments to make purchases with the benefit of charitable tax relief.

The really squalid element is the fact that Her Majesty's Government are stabbing the netting industry in the back to enhance the position of the rod fishing proprietors. Perhaps the most shameless manifestation of such top-level connivance came in the House on 20 July this year, when the Government whipped in 287 Tory members to vote to take salmon rod fishing rights out of the rating system in Scotland—just hours after the same Whips were required to defeat the measure to relieve disabled people from the poll tax. What a contrast of priorities! But I suppose that we should never under-estimate the Tory party's commitment to the landowning fraternity in Scotland. Who knows—perhaps that gratuitous handout of £1·5 million in rating relief for impoverished lairds will help to fund the financial commitments of the Atlantic Salmon Conservation Trust.

A centuries-old tradition of legal netting is falling prey to a sordid alliance between riparian owners and their friends in the Government. I hope that remaining netsmen on the Tay and elsewhere will be able to survive the onslaught, but I think that the saddest footnote for the salmon is that this clearance of legal netsmen is leaving the lower reaches of our rivers wide open for unscrupulous high-tech poachers. Genuine conservation is further away than ever, despite the protestations of those involved in the affair.

I find it difficult to choose between the poachers who fish illegally and the other category of big-time property poachers who are behind the Atlantic Salmon Conservation Trust, such as Sir William Gordon-Cumming and the hon. Patrick Wills, both of whom are trustees and have either direct or indirect connections with the Moray Firth Salmon Fishery Company, which could, I suspect, stand to benefit from any future revival of netting rights acquired by the trust. It is interesting to speculate on that possibility.

There can be no justification for the vicious discrimination and harassment suffered by Scotland's salmon netsmen. As the House has a duty to protect citizens' rights, we are entitled to demand an urgent and, if necessary, retrospective review of the trust's charitable status, in the hope that anything forthcoming from it would help to restore the employment of those thrown out of work without compensation. We should also demand an assurance from the Minister that he will publish proper, credible, scientific evidence about the impact of netting on salmon stocks, and that he will review the weekly close time in the light of that evidence.

The Minister can say what he likes when he replies, but I should like straight replies to two specific questions. First, is a review being conducted, internally or otherwise, by the Inland Revenue into the charitable status of this highly suspect trust? Secondly, will there be a proper review by the Government of the impact of netting on salmon stocks, in the light of genuine evidence, not hearsay, pressure or political arm-twisting?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): I have listened with great interest to the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Roberston). I must say that his criticism of the Government as champions of the landowning fraternity is hard to take from that quarter. As the hon. Gentleman presides over some 1,000 acres in the Borders, I am not sure whether I can champion him.

The hon. Gentleman made his views on the activities of the Atlantic Salmon Conservation Trust pretty clear. They are already well known, and I listened in vain tonight for anything new that he might have to say. He has criticised it, not for the first time, for buying out nets in various rivers and around the coast of Scotland. It is clear that the sales of those netting stations are purely commercial arrangements between willing purchasers and willing sellers. I realise that where the stations have been leased the lessee will be the loser if the agreement takes the nets out of operation, and that there will also be a loss of mainly seasonal employment, but I am not sure what the hon. Gentleman thinks the Government should do about it. Certainly nothing in current legislation would allow us to take action, even if we thought it justified.

The hon. Gentleman has also seen fit to criticise the charitable status of the trust and I understand that he is pursuing the matter through other channels. That is, of course, a matter for him and I do not intend now or in the future to comment on the trust's status or the tax benefits arising from that status. The tax position is a matter between the Revenue and the individual or the individual company. However, I deplore the hon. Gentleman's use of this place to attack an organisation that is committed to the conservation of salmon, by referring to it as a shady organisation and making the accusations that he has made using the cloak of privilege.

The hon. Gentleman should acknowledge that the Trust's stated aim is to conserve a balanced stock of fish by managing that stock of fish in respective rivers of origin. There are many—not just proprietors—who will support that aim and who would prefer to see local, small-scale fishing effort, including nets where appropriate, take the place of large-scale commercial catching of salmon in coastal areas. The issue is one of balance, and it would be wrong to suggest that heritable rights can never be acquired or used in a different way to take account of changing interests or changing circumstances. The hon. Gentleman is, if I may say so, a personal embodiment of that principle. He has sought to criticise the trustees of the trust and to suggest that they have interests, but he must know that none of the three trustees has any personal interest in the ownership of salmon fisheries. The articles of the trusts specifically prohibit any fishing proprietor from being a trustee.

The hon. Gentleman referred to illegal fishing, but there should be a better appreciation on his part of what the Government and other enforcement agencies are doing at present. The Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland is aware of the increase in the reports of illegal fishing both in coastal waters and further out at sea, and has deployed enforcement resources accordingly. The hon. Gentleman asked what initiatives had been taken. I do not know whether he is aware of the successful prosecution of an Irish vessel operating outwith the 12-mile United Kingdom limit and the resulting penalty of some £9,500 for salmon offences. In addition, over 17 miles of illegally set salmon nets have been lifted by the protection service, and plans are already being made for enforcement deployment in 1989.

The hon. Gentleman argued that the loss of fishing time and the absence of lawful netsmen for the additional hours of the weekly close time will lead to less watching of the estuaries and the coast. I am not sure whether that is the case, but I would point out that there is an argument which, if it is pursued along those lines, comes to the absurd conclusion that there should be no weekly close time at all, on the basis that the continuous presence of netsmen and anglers will reduce or eliminate poaching.

Mr. Home Robertson: That is a rather weak point for the Minister to be reading from his brief, and whoever gave it to him needs to be checked out. The hon. Gentleman is not the sort of person whom I would normally invite to my house, but if he is seriously interested in this matter, on any weekend he could come to where I live on the Tweed and I could show him ample evidence of poaching, which was much less prevalent when there were people whose job it was to look after those banks and net those rivers legally. Now that those people have been removed, because of the actions of the hon. Gentleman and those of the trust, that estuary is bandit territory and the netting effort has increased.

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. Gentleman has evidence or can point to examples of people who are breaking the law, it is not me whom he should invite to witness that. I must say that he has double standards. The hon. Gentleman criticised the Government for derating salmon property in Scotland and the resources being made available to the boards, but at the same time he argues that more action should be taken against poachers.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Forsyth: No, I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. The effect of derating will be to make additional resources available to district fishery boards and thereby increase the resources that they have available to enforce action.

Mr. Wilson: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Forsyth: I shall not give way.

Mr. Wilson: What the Minister is saying is utter rubbish.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. Mr. Forsyth.

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. Gentleman thinks that he will make any progress in the House by being offensive and difficult, he has something to learn.

The hon. Member for East Lothian said that the loss of fishing time and the absence of lawful netsmen for the additional hours of the weekly close time will lead to less watching of the estuaries and the coast. If the hon. Gentleman followed that argument to its logical conclusion, we would have no close time. I remind the hon. Gentleman that it was a Labour Government——

Mr. Wilson rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The Minister has made it clear that he will not give way. The hon. Gentleman has not sought to intervene in the Adjournment debate, and if the Minister is not giving way, I must ask the hon. Gentleman to resume his seat.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Member for East Lothian will recall that it was a Labour Government who, in 1951, first extended the close time—without any compensation for the interests for whom the hon. Gentleman has made a plea tonight.

The hon. Gentleman made much play of the arguments about weekly close time for salmon netting. Earlier this year, the hon. Gentleman and I had a long discussion about this matter. We have consulted widely on our proposals and we have taken account of the views that have been expressed by the various interests. We did not bring the increase in close time into force immediately, as was done in 1951, and we gave notice until 6 May 1988 so that netsmen had a little breathing space.

Of course it is understandable that, since then, representations have been made on behalf of netsmen. I understand, however, that there is considerable support for the Government's decision. When the hon. Gentleman adopts a one-sided approach to the matter, he would do well to bear in mind that support as well as the fact that many regard the Government's decision favourably, on conservation grounds. The hon. Gentleman, more than most hon. Members, should appreciate the importance of passing on to the next generation what the present generation has inherited.

It is repeatedly alleged that an increase in the weekly close time is unnecessary because most, if not all, rivers in Scotland are fully stocked. All that the scientific evidence shows, however, is that young salmon can be found in all Scottish rivers where access and water quality are adequate. That does not mean that all rivers are fully stocked. There can be no doubt, in my view, that increasing the weekly close time will lead to larger numbers of eggs being deposited. In some areas that may well result in increased production of smolts. What is clear is that simply tinkering with the close time would have done no good at all—any increase had to be fairly substantial.

There is no reason why netsmen should continue to take such a high proportion of the fish landed. Their heritable rights give them no entitlement to a fixed proportion of the catch. At a time when salmon farming is producing large and growing quantities of salmon for the table and export, I can think of no logical reason for not shifting the balance of exploitation from netting to angling to some extent, which makes a greater contribution to the Scottish economy.

Mr. Wilson: Rubbish.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman would do well to consider his constituency interests and the interests of the hotel, tourist and service sector, which benefit from the substantial contributions made by rod fishing.

This debate has highlighted once again the divergence of views that the issue of wild salmon arouses. Clearly I cannot satisfy the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), but I can point to evidence of the positive measures that the Government have taken to improve the management and conservation of wild salmon.

The Salmon Act 1986 was a major step forward. It gave new impetus to local conservation and enforcement by district salmon fishery boards and initiated the review of north-east of England drift net fishery. It set up the Salmon Advisory Committee, whose first report we are now considering.

The Government have played a major part in the wider, international conservation efforts of NASCO—the North Atlantic Salmon Conservation Organisation—and other bodies and will continue to do so. Conservation of wild salmon is a major heritage, amenity and economic issue for Scotland, as it has been for centuries. The hon. Gentleman may want to fossilise one aspect of salmon fishing, but times change and I believe that the measures that the Government are taking reflect the wider public interest in Scotland.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Eleven o'clock.

Oral Answers to Questions

SCOTLAND

Rating Reform

1. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what figures he now has as to the percentage of adults in Scotland who have registered for the community charge; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Mr. Ian Lang): Preliminary indications from community charges registration officers are that the number of people included on the community charges registers, which came into force on 1 October, amount on average to more than 99 per cent. of the adults resident in their areas according to the Registrar General's population figures.

Mr. Bennett: Does my hon. Friend agree that those figures give the lie to the campaign organised by some Labour Members that the Scottish people should refuse to register? Does my hon. Friend further agree that the figures confirm the good sense of the Scottish people in obeying the law and ignoring the illegal "Stop it" campaign supported by Labour Members?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. A very bad example has been set by the Labour party in the matter of law breaking. The Scottish people, however, believe in obeying the law, and attempts by the Labour party to frustrate the compilation of the register have clearly failed.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: Does the Minister accept that tomorrow will see one of the first main tests of public opinion on the poll tax in Scotland and that the votes cast in Glasgow, Govan tomorrow will show support for the SNP non-payment campaign and very little support for the Conservative party and the community charge?

Mr. Lang: I do not accept the hon. Lady's attitude and I await with interest the evidence of the 100,000-strong army of non-payers and law breakers that she intends to recruit to the SNP.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: Will my hon. Friend congratulate the people of Scotland on rejecting the blandishments to criminal activity by members of the Labour party and the Scottish National party, with the honourable exception of the shadow Secretary of State? Will my hon. Friend remind the Scottish people that, on average, the community charge will be only £5 per week per head, that if they are sensible enough to vote Tory, for example, in Perth and Kinross, it will be only £4 per week, but that if they are stupid enough to vote Labour it may be anything up to double that amount?

Mr. Lang: My hon. and learned Friend is absolutely right to draw attention to the figures published last week by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. I emphasise that those figures are not speculative, but are founded in fact. They reflect the known facts relating to the increase in inflation, which can affect the ceiling on business rates and the distribution and amounts of revenue support grant. As a result, any council spending more than the figure given by my right hon. and learned Friend will be doing so because it is increasing its spending.

Mr. Dewar: The Minister is simply peddling myths and doing so rather pathetically. Does he accept that at no time has the Labour party advocated non-registration? Our aim has been to build a coalition against the poll tax and we have succeeded remarkably. If the Minister wishes to shrug that off, how does he account for the fact that the poll tax is almost universally unpopular and in vast areas of Scotland his party is now an electoral joke?

Mr. Lang: It is plain that the hon. Gentleman is out of touch with the facts. Not only do recent opinion polls show a rise in support for the community charge, but in the past five months there has been a dramatic fall from 31 to 8 per cent. in the number of people intending to follow the blandishments of Labour Members of Parliament not to pay the community charge.

Health Boards (Savings)

2. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether savings have been made by the health boards in Scotland as a result of putting their ancillary services out to competitive tender.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Michael Forsyth): Yes. In December 1987 I asked health boards to re-examine the potential for competitive tendering. The contracts awarded by the beginning of November as a result will save more than £14·5 million in the following three years, and that will be used for reinvestment in direct patient care.

Mr. Riddick: Can my hon. Friend confirm that the main opposition to competitive tendering has come from the Scottish TUC, the trade unions and the Scottish Labour party? While the Labour party argues in public that more money should be put into the Health Service, is it not true that in reality it is far more interested in maintaining its trade union monopoly empire, even at the expense of patient care? Does that not demonstrate the double standards of the TUC and the Scottish Labour party?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend is absolutely right in all but one respect—the policy of competitive tendering was opposed by all Opposition parties and by all Socialists in Scotland. My hon. Friend is right to point out that in doing so they have opposed improvements in patient care. The £14·5 million that has been saved is equivalent to 2,400 heart bypass operations, 4,800 hip replacement operations, the salaries of 700 extra nurses and 1,300 renal dialysis machines. I must tell Opposition Members who represent constituencies in the Edinburgh area that it is also equivalent to the entire cost of the recently completed phase 2 of the Western general hospital in Edinburgh, which provides 144 new acute beds in an intensive therapy unit.

Dr. Moonie: It might help if the Minister spent some of that money on providing a heart for himself. Can he give figures for the cost to the Health Service in Scotland during the next year of redundancy payments as a result of privatisation?

Mr. Forsyth: I know that the Glasgow Herald has suggested that the hon. Gentleman has given me too easy a time, but he will need to try a little harder than that to get accolades from that source.

The redundancy costs will be a one-off payment over the full period of the contract. I cannot give a precise figure, but about 2,000 people will be affected by competitive tendering. The best estimate I have is about £4 million over the total period.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that all the evidence on competitive tendering and the way in which we are using the money to benefit patients shows clearly that we are the only party that really cares about the patients? Will he confirm the story going around that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) has been consulting my hon. Friend on competitive tendering as he is considering that as a method to bolster his Front-Bench team?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend is right to point out the use of competitive tendering in the allocation of Front-Bench positions. Indeed, even the policy of opting out appears attractive to some people on the Opposition Front Bench.

My hon. Friend rightly said that our policy is in the interests of the patient. It has resulted in additional resources being made available for health care. It is significant that when it comes to crossing NUPE or COHSE, no Opposition Member is prepared to defend the interests of the patient.

Mr. Galbraith: Is it not true that the Government's paper savings are, in fact, of no benefit to the patients? The Government's policy is nothing but a piece of political ideology.

Can the Minister confirm that redundancy payments resulting from competitive tendering have been so large that the Scottish Office coffers are running low? Have not the health boards been told that in future they must pay 75 per cent. of all redundancy payments? When will the hon. Gentleman give up this rubbish about competitive tendering? When will he realise that the function of the Health Service is to look after the patients, not to put money into the pockets of his former clients and companies that have funded the Conservative party?

Mr. Forsyth: I have already confirmed that the estimate for redundancy costs is about £4 million. That is compared with savings of £14·5 million. The hon. Gentleman knows that redundancy costs are paid from the centre. There is adequate provision in our budget to meet them. There is no question of health boards having to find the money. Indeed, the Scottish health boards have £14·5 million available as additional resources for patient care. If the hon. Gentleman had had his way, that money would not have been available to them.

Pesticides

3. Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement detailing the funding of research into the harmful effects of pesticides used in the Scottish agriculture industry.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland participates in programmes for the surveillance of pesticide residues in retail foods and provides interested parties with information on the environmental impact of pesticides.

Mr. Hood: Will the Minister acknowledge that his Government have announced cuts of £31·5 million in agricultural research in the United Kingdom, £2·37 million of which will be cut from Scottish agricultural research, which will have a devastating effect on scientists, jobs and their good work on behalf of consumers? Does he agree that those cuts will cost 79 jobs—10 per cent. of such jobs? Does he also agree that the research is into the safe use of pesticides in agriculture to make food free from pesticide pollution? Will he tell the House how he can support such ridiculous cuts?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman's question was about research funding for pesticides in Scotland. There have been no cuts, because there is no research funded in Scotland for that purpose. The hon. Gentleman talked about cuts in other research. We propose that additional resources for research in Scotland should come from those who benefit from it—the private sector. The hon. Gentleman makes a fundamental mistake if he assumes that making those who can afford to contribute pay is making cuts.

Mrs. Ray Michie: Will the Minister please define "near market research" in terms of agricultural research and development?

Mr. Forsyth: I am not entirely certain what the hon. Lady is complaining about.

Mrs. Michie: I am not complaining.

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. Lady is not complaining about the Government's policy, I am delighted. I should have thought that she would support our policy of encouraging those who have a commercial interest and who will benefit from research carried out by the Government to make a greater contribution. She is quick to come to the House and argue for the interests of her constituents, particularly those who are involved in agriculture. She should welcome our policy, which will make more resources available to those who need help and support.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Clearly, the Minister is ill informed about the previous subject. Is he aware that the Barnes review, with its threat to near market research, is threatening institutes, such as the Moredun research institute and King's buildings in Edinburgh, is threatening to cut 1,500 jobs nationally and £30 million off the budget, although many of these institutes have already gone out and got a great deal of sponsorship and support from private industry, and is threatening to deal a mortal blow to them?

Mr. Forsyth: If the research is worth while to the industries which will benefit from it, surely they will be prepared to make a greater contribution than at present. In asserting that the money will not be forthcoming, the hon. Gentleman is asserting that the research is not of value, and I cannot possibly agree with that.

Industrial Rates

4. Mr. Lambie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he has any proposals for changing the method of calculating Scottish industrial rates.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): From 1 April next year the maximum possible increase in business rates will be indexed to the rate of inflation. The Government are, moreover, committed to moving to a common non-domestic rate poundage in all areas.

Mr. Lambie: When will the Secretary of State be in a position to respond to the recent representations that he has received from the Chemical Industries Association and the United Kingdom Petroleum Industry Association that he should use his existing powers to set centrally a formula for calculating the decapitalisation rates to be used in dealing with the contractors' principle of valuation?

Mr. Rifkind: I assure the hon. Gentleman that that is being actively considered.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Will my right hon. and learned Friend reaffirm that, unlike the Opposition, the Government have no intention of introducing rating of agricultural land?

Mr. Rifkind: I recollect that at the last election the Labour party proposed that agricultural land should be rated for the first time. I have not the slightest doubt that that would be devastating to the interests of Scottish agriculture or that those in the rural community would be aware of a proposal to that effect.

Mr. Maxton: When the Secretary of State arrived at the absurd poll tax figures for next year, did he assess inflation for business rates by local government rises in costs, or by the standard rate of inflation? What account was taken of the number of people who will be in arrears? Does he agree with the Scottish Consumer Council that 50 per cent. of those who receive rebates will be in arrears three months after the tax coming into force? Did he take that into account when he arrived at the local government poll tax figures?

Mr. Rifkind: I understand the hon. Gentleman's embarrassment at the fact that we published figures based not on cuts being made by local authorities but on their existing level of expenditure. The non-domestic rate has been increased by the rate of inflation and the revenue support grant is being increased by almost double the rate of inflation. The simple fact that may cause discomfort to the hon. Gentleman and his local authority friends is that the figures that we published last Friday were based on the level of expenditure that local authorities are incurring in the current year. The non-domestic rate has been indexed to the rate of inflation and the increase in revenue support grant is substantially more than the current rate of inflation. The only explanation for local authorities choosing higher community charges is that they are going for growth in expenditure. Under the new system of local authority finance, for the first time local authorities will be accountable to their electors, all of whom will be asked to contribute to the cost of that excessive spending.

Infant Teaching

5. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will reconsider publishing the information collected for the Scottish Education Department's report on the under-sixes following publication of the House of Commons Select Committee on Education report on the under-fives.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No, Sir.

Mrs. Fyfe: Is the Minister aware that he has presided over the worst pre-school provision of all the member states of the EEC? Britain has the lowest provision, and Scotland is lower than that. Has he read the modest proposals in the EEC Childcare Network report? If so, how does he intend to respond to them? What is he hiding by refusing to publish his Department's report?

Mr. Forsyth: I am not aware of the assertions that the hon. Lady has made, but if the position is unsatisfactory it is because pre-school provision is a local authority responsibility. If the hon. Lady is arguing that the position is less than satisfactory, I should point out that under this Government the number of pupils under-fives attending some form of pre-school provision has risen by 5,000 since 1981. The majority of children aged between three and four are involved in pre-school provision. As to not publishing the Department's study, the hon. Lady will know that it was not completed. It was a research project, not a symphony, and it would not be useful if it were published in an unfinished form.

Mr. Wray: Will the Minister explain why in 1977 a Labour Government spent more on nursery education than this Tory Government spent in 1988? According to Government figures given in answers to questions on 25 July, 29,300 pupils were receiving education in 1977, which cost £29,490,000. In 1988, with 10,000 more pupils and 89 more school departments, £300,000 less was spent on nursery education in Scotland, with £3 million less being spent in Strathclyde.

Mr. Forsyth: It was not a Labour Government who spent the money. The responsibility for pre-school provision rests with local authorities. Through the rate support grant, the Government have made an increase in provision of 26 per cent. since 1979. Although we have given mainly Labour-controlled local authorities more money for this purpose, they have chosen to spend it on other priorities. The hon. Gentleman must take up the matter with his colleagues on Stratchclyde regional council and other Labour-controlled authorities.

A74

6. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on progress with plans to modernise the A74.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): The Government are committed to upgrading the A74 to motorway status. The A74 route corridor has been divided into three sections for feasibility study purposes and a consulting engineer has been commissioned for each. Final reports should be available fairly soon, but it will take some time to assess the consultants' findings and recommendations.

Mr. Bellingham: As one who holidays regularly in Scotland and often uses the A74, I welcome my hon. Friend's comments. Does he agree that it is surprising, when so much money has been spent on Scotland's road infrastructure, that this road has been neglected, given that it is Scotland's most important road? Is my hon. Friend aware that there have been many fatal crossover accidents on the A74? Surely it is time to have crash barriers installed down the whole length of the road.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I note my hon. Friend's comments about crash barriers. It is important for the infrastructure of the lowlands of Scotland that this development should go ahead as soon as practicable. Studies are progressing as quickly as possible, but it will be next year before preliminary conclusions can be drawn. It will not be until late 1989 that a public announcement can be made and draft orders prepared. Work on the first scheme of the project will begin as quickly as possible, and continue through the 1990s. I shall look into my hon. Friend's point about crash barriers and accidents and let him know the results.

Mr. McKelvey: Does the Minister recall that on his recent visit to Kilmarnock he travelled along the A77, which joins the A74? Does he realise that that is the main route from Kilmarnock to the south? Is the hon. Gentleman aware that almost 15 miles of that four-lane route have no barrier or central reservation and that frequently there are serious accidents on those stretches? Will the hon. Gentleman ensure that in the foreseeable future barriers are placed down the whole length of the A77?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman's point does not spring from this question, but I shall look into it and let him have a full reply on crash barriers. We still have to make decisions on the allocations for the roads programme for next year, and I shall be in touch with the hon. Gentleman about that.

Mr. Jack rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does this road go through Fylde?

Mr. Jack: My question is about Scotland, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Then I call Mr. Jack.

Mr. Jack: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Will my hon. Friend confirm that the A77 is not the only road improvement at which he is looking or which has been completed in Scotland, and that other projects have made a major contribution to the improved Scottish infrastructure and to improvements in the economy which seem to have been ignored by the Opposition?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: More than £100 million is spent each year on the Scottish trunk roads programme. The building of the M74, like the building of the A9, will be spread over a considerable number of years. We shall bear in mind the needs of all the other road programmes throughout Scotland.

Motherwell Enterprise Trust

7. Dr. Bray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the Motherwell enterprise trust.

Mr. Rifkind: During a visit to Lanarkshire on 27 and 28 September I met representatives of the Motherwell enterprise trust on a number of occasions, when there was a useful opportunity to discuss the operation of the trust and its various activities.

Dr. Bray: Is the Secretary of State aware that his visit was welcome, but he will need to come back soon because he left a lot of unfinished business? Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that the Scottish Development Agency has run down, almost to the point of closure, its Motherwell project office and that many issues in Lanarkshire are too big for local enterprise trusts to handle? Has the right hon. and learned Gentleman checked in particular what the BSC privatisation prospectus will be able to say about the essential contribution that Ravenscraig, Dalzell and Clydesdale will make to industry in Scotland?

Mr. Rifkind: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his kind invitation to visit his constituency again. Consideration is being given to a further phase of the Motherwell project. In addition, we have substantially increased the resources available to the Motherwell enterprise trust, from £13,000 last year to £30,000 in 1988-89. The trust has received more than £60,000 from the SDA for specific projects this year in the area of the Motherwell enterprise trust. I have no doubt that Ravenscraig and Dalzell will continue to make an important contribution to the employment and economy of Lanarkshire, and I think that that is the view of both sides of the House.

Scottish Homes

8. Mr. Ingram: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about progress with the establishment of Scottish Homes.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Under the Housing (Scotland) Act Scottish Homes will be established formally on 1 December 1988. The chairman, chief executive and eight additional members of the Scottish Homes board have now been appointed.

Mr. Ingram: The Minister is pressing on with his intention to wind up public sector housing in Scotland, but does he think that it is democratic to transfer the control of housing stock from one housing body to another without consulting the tenants, as occurred recently in the Borders? Is it democratic to refuse direct representation for the 83,000 Scottish Special Housing Association tenants of Scottish Homes?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Tenancies in the Borders have not been transferred. What is at stake is a management agreement. The SSHA has a number of management agreements with district councils. The SSHA is perfectly entitled to have them, but it is under an obligation to ensure that a very good service is provided. All that most tenants of Scottish Homes will notice is a change of name. They will have the same rights and their rents will be fixed in the same way. Furthermore, the tenants will deal with the same people as they dealt with in the past.

Mr. Ron Brown: As many SSHA tenants have been conned into buying their substandard homes, will the Minister agree to meet a delegation of their representatives before Scottish Homes comes into existence?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am not quite sure what the hon. Gentleman wants me to see a delegation about, but the rights that SSHA tenants now enjoy will be maintained and will continue. Scottish Homes is designed to encourage and bring about urban regeneration by means of a much faster and more efficient process than has been used in the past.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will my hon. Friend confirm that public sector investment in public housing in Scotland has increased by 16 per cent. under this Government, whereas it fell by 37 per cent. in real terms when the Labour party was in power? Therefore, the Opposition have no right to complain about my hon. Friend's performance.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Public sector investment has increased substantially since 1979. The recent supplementary allocation for public sector spending on public sector housing in Scotland has amounted to an increase of more than £30 million in the past year.

Mr. Home Robertson: I do not know who is handing out these daft supplementary questions to English Back Benchers on the Government side of the House, but will the Minister confirm that he is encouraging the SSHA to transfer the management, and in due course the ownership, of SSHA houses in various areas to private interests? Does he recall an assurance given in the House on 11 January by the Secretary of State for Scotland that no indvidual SSHA tenant would be compulsorily transferred to a high-rent, low-security tenancy in the private sector? Since it would have been unparliamentary for the Secretary of State to have lied to the House at that time, will the Minister tell us what those assurances really meant?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: With regard to tenants' choice, my right hon. and learned Friend said that every commitment he has made will be adhered to and stood by. There have been voluntary disposals of tenancies by local authorities for many years, including the setting up of co-operatives. If subsequently there should be a proposal to change the ownership of Waverley housing trust, tenants will be given the statutory right to be consulted.

That statutory right is to be debated later today.

Eduation Reform

9. Mr. Harry Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received on national testing and the national curriculum.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There were over 1,000 responses to the consultation document on curriculum and assessment and these showed considerable support for the principles of redefining the curriculum, improving assessment and giving more and better information to

Mr. Ewing: It is not a question of more and better information—in other words, national testing. Will the Minister explain in simple terms to very worried parents what will happen to a child if, when he is tested at seven and 11, he produces poor results? What impact will that have on that child when he goes into secondary education?

One of the main reasons, among others, for the people of Govan voting for Bob Gillespie, the Labour candidate, tomorrow is that parents in Govan are desperately worried about the serious damage that the Minister is doing to Scottish education.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Member should recognise that when we talk about more information for parents, we are not talking just about introducing testing in English and mathematics at primary four and primary seven. We are talking about providing a new report card that will give information about each child's performance in every subject. It will include a statement to parents about what their children are expected to learn and the level of attainment that they have reached. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that people in Govan or anywhere else do not want to know how well their children are doing at school, he is out of touch.

When a child is identified as having difficulty with basic literacy and numeracy, he or she should be given extra assistance. One of the things that have come out of restart is the fact that far too many children have gone right through primary and secondary education, but have come out with basic difficulties in literacy and numeracy. Not only have those difficulties not been identified, they have not been attended to.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my hon. Friend agree that a recent opinion poll shows that two Scots out of three approve of the Government's educational policies? Does he agree also that those policies give parents more information and will result in better standards? Does he further agree that the same opinion poll showed that two Scots out of three want opting out to be introduced to the Scottish system? Will he fulfil the wishes of the Scottish people and introduce a Bill in the near future that will allow opting out?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to that recent opinion poll, but I should add that it was carried out by the Daily Express. The Mori poll carried out in May for The Scotsman might be more to the taste of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar). Even then, before the Educational Institute of Scotland's campaign, which seems to have coalesced support for the Government's proposals, the Mori poll showed that some 45 per cent. of parents approve of testing in primary schools. The general secretary of the EIS has said that, by drawing attention to the desire for choice and information for parents, the Government have identified a weakness in the education system in Scotland which parents are determined to have removed.

Mr. Norman Hogg: In what way have the Government altered their stance on the curriculum and assessment to meet the reservations of teachers and parents? Does the Minister agree that there continue to be severe reservations about the narrowing of the curriculum, ranking of pupils in schools, teaching to tests and placing undue stress on young children? Why do these fears persist in spite of the Secretary of State's statement? Who has the Secretary of State convinced? Who has the Minister convinced? They have certainly not convinced parents and teachers in Scotland.

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman is always very fair, and he is fair enough to point out that we have adapted our proposals on the curriculum and assessment to meet anxieties that have been expressed about the ranking of pupils and selection. He is right to say that my right hon. and learned Friend has given a clear indication that the results of testing will not be used to rank children in class and that the information will be limited to parents and teachers. There is no question of pass and fail examinations being used to provide entry to a secondary school. [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman asked why nobody believes that. The answer is, I think, that there are not many people in politics or in the trade union movement who share his respect for the facts and for constructive and informed debate.

Mr. Harry Ewing: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of the utterly unsatisfactory nature of that reply, I give notice that I shall seek leave to raise the matter on the Adjournment at the earliest opportunity.

Industry (Ownership)

10. Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has of the likely pattern of ownership of industry in Scotland over the next five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: In the past nine years there has been a net increase of around 15,000 registered Scottish companies, and the number of individual shareholders in Scotland has doubled. Given the maintenance of the Government's economic policies, which have created in Scotland an environment in which enterprise can flourish, I fully expect these trends to continue.

Mr. Darling: If Terry Butcher and I can share the same platform in defence of a Scottish company, will the Minister accept that there is a growing feeling that Scottish and Newcastle is merely one company in a line of others that is at risk of foreign takeover in Scotland? Will he accept that the Government's open-door policy to mergers will put the ownership of Scottish industry at risk, and that companies such as Scottish Electricity will be owned by people who are based on the other side of the world, perhaps, and not in Scotland? What will he do to protect Scottish industry?

Mr. Lang: I understand the hon. Gentleman's anxiety about a specific company. As he knows, the Director General of Fair Trading has been reviewing the matter and the Scottish Office has been involved in the consultations. The director general's report has been passed to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, and presumably he will make an announcement in due course.

Sir Russell Johnston: Will the Minister say what advice his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has given to Lord Young about the takeover? What estimate has the Government made of job losses in the event of Elders being successful?

Mr. Lang: I am not in a position to disclose advice of that sort to the hon. Gentleman. The result of the Scottish Council's surveys show that there are as many jobs in manufacturing industry in Scottish-owned companies now as there were 10 years ago. The hon. Gentleman is unduly sensitive about that issue.

Mr. Redwood: Does my hon. Friend agree that the most dramatic change in ownership in Scotland could come about in the next five years from a large privatisation programme? Does he accept that that would be a real way in which to return power and control to the Scottish people? That is something that hon. Members on both sides of the House should welcome, especially those who represent parties which cannot decide whether they are for or against devolution of power.

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is right. The greatest single cause for the transfer of Scottish companies out of Scotland—the transfers include the famous companies of Colville, Stewart and Lloyd, Scott Lithgow, Yarrow, Kincaid, Robb Caledon, Alexanders and MacBrayne—has been nationalisation under Labour Governments. We propose to denationalise industry. As my hon. Friend says, that will enable electricity companies and bus companies, for example, to be re-established in Scotland.

European Single Market

11. Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he proposes to take to encourage the presence of business headquarters in Scotland in advance of the single European market; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: Through Locate in Scotland the Government continue successfully to encourage companies to establish themselves in Scotland. Many such companies have already set up headquarters for their manufacturing facilities in Scotland in order to serve European markets; and 1992 offers further opportunities for such developments.

Mr. Doran: Perhaps the Minister will agree with me that although it is important to attract new industry to Scotland, it is important also to protect local and indigenous industry. Is he aware that this afternoon the Hall Russell shipyard in my constituency has been forced to bring in the receiver, thus putting at risk 450 jobs and the only remaining shipyard on the east coast of Scotland? Will he join me in encouraging the Overseas Development Administration to allow the yard sufficient draw-down facilities to ensure the completion of the St. Helena ferry, which is now under construction, and assist us in our aim to retain the yard as a viable unit under the receiver, with a view to a successful purchase in future?

Mr. Lang: I have noted with concern and regret the decision of Hall Russell to call in a receiver this afternoon. I hope that the difficulty will prove to be transitional. The ODA will wish to be in touch with the receiver because of its interest in the St. Helena ferry. The ODA stands ready to give whatever help it can to secure the future of the yard.

Mr. Oppenheim: Has my hon. Friend seen the recent figures that show that the output of the Scottish electronics industry has expanded by one third in the past five years and that the number of skilled technical graduates employed in the industry has increased by no less than 25 per cent.? Of the foreign investors that are investing in the industry, American and Japanese companies predominate. All this is excellent news, but it highlights the danger to the Scottish economy of the Fortress Europe mentality that is now so prevalent in Brussels.

Mr. Lang: I take my hon. Friend's point. He is right to draw attention to the success of the Scottish electronics industry, which now provides about 45,000 jobs. Increasing numbers of companies from America, Japan and elsewhere are choosing to locate their manufacturing base in Scotland for the single European market in 1992. This gives a more accurate reflection of the reality of the Scottish economy than some of the comments that we hear from Opposition Members.

Mr. Dewar: Does the Minister accept that the serious and disturbing news about Hall Russell directly threatens the existence of an important and well-established Scottish company? Does he recognise that, whatever the difficulties faced by management, the skills of the work force are still there, the St. Helena ferry order has still to be completed, and, I hope, that further orders can be won? We would all echo the Minister's hope that the difficulties will be transitional, but will he give a guarantee that he will take positive steps to see that the yard remains in business and that the jobs are secured?

Mr. Lang: If the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that the Government should step in with an open cheque book, I have to draw his attention to the EC directive on such matters. We stand ready to give whatever help we can to the Scottish Development Agency and, as I said earlier, we hope that this will be a transitional difficulty.

Education Reform

12. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received in favour of bringing his proposals for educational reform in Scotland into line with England.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend has no such proposals. Our education policy throughout the United Kingdom is geared to ensuring greater parental involvement in the management of schools, an extension of parental choice, and the pursuit of excellence. This is in the best traditions of the Scottish education system.

Mr. Thompson: Bearing in mind the evidence of strong support in Scotland for the education reforms being carried through by the Government, will my hon. Friend confirm that there already is in Scotland a majority of parents on school boards, making nonsense of Opposition claims that in some way Scotland is following England? Quite the reverse is the case.

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the parental majority on school boards in Scotland, which contrasts with the position in England. It is a bit rich that the Educational Institute of Scotland complains in Scotland that our proposals for reform represent Anglicisation, while at the same time it comes to London to the other place to claim that Scotland is being unfairly treated because there is a majority of parents provided for in the School Boards (Scotland) Bill and urging the other place to reject those proposals to bring Scotland into line with England. The cry in Scotland appears to be Anglicisation, and in London that Scotland is being prevented from having a separate system. My hon. Friend points to the evidence of considerable support for our proposals, and he is right to do so. [HON. MEMBERS: "What evidence?"] Those hon. Members who say, "What evidence?" should have a word with their constituents.

Mr. McAllion: Does the Minister agree that, through the ballot box and the Government's consultation process, the people of Scotland plainly rejected his plans for introducing school boards and provisions to opt out of local authority education? How does he justify introducing those wide-ranging changes in Scottish education—a specifically Scottish institution—without first seeking to gain the consent of the Scottish people?

Mr. Forsyth: I do not accept that the majority in Scotland are opposed to the school boards proposals. I believe that they will be welcome. Let me draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to what the leader of Strathclyde's education committee, Convener Malcolm Green, said the other day. In response to our opting-out proposals—[Interruption.] In response to my right hon. and learned Friend's hint that he might be considering opting out, he said:

"It is now in our interest to redouble our efforts to create a good climate so that school boards realise the real value of the service they get from the authority and what they would miss if they do not have the authority to call upon."

Even the threat of opting out seems to produce benefits for parents in Scotland.

Hospitals (Competitive Tendering)

13. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made with regard to competitive tendering in National Health Service hospitals in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Since December 1987, when I asked health boards to re-examine the potential for competitive tendering they have been awarding contracts for catering and domestic services. By the beginning of November 39 contracts had been awarded, which will produce estimated savings over the next three years of over £14·5 million. A few more contracts are still to be awarded during this current round and thereafter boards will press ahead with further tendering.

Mr. Hind: Does my hon. Friend agree that competitive tendering in the Health Service in Scotland will help further to improve it, as indeed the Government have already done by increasing the amount of money spent in the Health Service by 30 per cent. since 1979 and increasing the number of consultants by 10 per cent. and the number of qualified nurses by 30 per cent.?

Mr. Forsyth: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. One of the most significant aspects of the competitive tendering process, which Opposition Members used to call privatisation, is that 70 per cent. of contracts and the bulk of the savings have been achieved from in-house bids by the existing work forces looking at the way in which they provide the services, removing restrictive practices and overmanning, and seeing that every penny is directed to the interests of their patients.

Mr. Strang: Is it not an absolute scandal that more than 800 ancillary workers are being sacked by the Lothian health board to make way for private contractors? How does the Minister justify that action? Many of those women have given more than 20 years' dedicated service to the board. Is the Minister proud of the fact that they have been offered jobs inferior to those they have at present, sometimes involving less than half the number of hours that they currently work?

Mr. Forsyth: What was an absolute scandal was the lack of leadership shown by the trade union movement towards the people who were in that position. The trade unions refused to take part in the competitive tendering process, and in some cases the health boards had to bring in management consultants to assist the in-house work forces make their bids. The trade unions abandoned them. Despite that, many of those in-house bids were successful. As the hon. Gentleman knows, those who lost their employment because of the introduction of private contractors have in the main, as a matter of priority, been offered jobs by the private firms concerned. As the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) pointed out, they are fully entitled to any redundancy payments that may arise from their length of service.

Electoral Registers

14. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the anticipated percentage change in the numbers appearing on the electoral registers for 1988 and 1989.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No forecasts of the numbers on the electoral register are prepared. The projected population aged 17 and over shows an increase of 0·16 per cent. between 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Barnes: Is there not a considerable danger that, due to the operation of the poll tax in Scotland, the franchise will be considerably reduced, either in the coming year or by 1990, when the tax will begin to bite? In those circumstances, clearly there is a case for repealing the legislation, otherwise a future Government may have to introduce a Re-enfranchisement of the People Act.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No, I cannot accept that suggestion. On the basis of the population projections, a slight increase of about 11,000, or 0·28 per cent., might have been expected. The actual numbers show a fall of about 27,500, or 0·69 per cent. As to the reasons, no definite information is available on what part of that reduction might be attributable to any one factor, such as changes in practice by electoral registration officers or the removal of dual registrations.

Mr. Patnick: Can my hon. Friend explain what percentage of the Scottish electorate vote in local elections, and can he say what effect, if any, the community charge will have on voting patterns?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The percentage of the electorate voting in local elections is considerably below that for general elections——

Mr. Harry Ewing: What is it?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) asks me what exactly is the figure. To the best of my knowledge, it is less than 50 per cent.

This question relates directly to the electoral roll, and it is vitally important that it is kept separate from the community charge register; that it is separately prepared and maintained. That is the crux of the matter.

Pollution

15. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received about pollution in the North sea.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Since 1 July this year my right hon. and learned Friend has received representations about pollution in the North sea from the hon. and learned Gentleman, and from two organisations and five individuals.

Mr. Campbell: Does the Minister accept that there is real concern about the level of pollution in the North sea up and down the whole of Scotland's east coast? Will he undertake on behalf of the Government to take proper steps to deal with that matter? In particular, will he give an undertaking to make the necessary capital allocation to Fife regional council, so that it can institute the Levenmouth sewage disposal scheme?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Fife regional council's allocation for water and sewerage has risen steadily from £5·5 million in 1985-86 to £7·7 million in 1988-89. Sixty to 70 per cent. of that figure relates to sewerage and sewage treatment. The allocation and guideline figures for 1989-90 and for 1990-91 are close to the council's own planned expenditure figures and are about 11 per cent. above the Scottish per capita average. Nevertheless, I take seriously the hon. and learned Gentleman's general point.

Dr. Godman: The Minister knows that our fishermen are deeply concerned about marine pollution. Does he agree that they would be encouraged if the Government were to instruct Occidental to remove completely from the sea bed what remains of the ill-fated Piper Alpha? Will the Minister kindly advise his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy that section 5 of the Petroleum Act 1987 gives him precisely that power to impose upon Occidental a programme of complete removal?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentlman has raised a very interesting point, which I shall draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy.

Scottish Development Agency

16. Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next expects to have a meeting with the chairman of the Scottish Development Agency; and what matters will be discussed.

Mr. Rifkind: I meet the chairman, board and chief executive of the agency on a regular basis to discuss issues of mutual interest. The next such meeting is due to take place early next year.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept the thanks and congratulations of the people of Scotland for the £92 million that he has won from the Treasury in addition to our budget? May I also congratulate him on increasing the budget of the Scottish Development Agency to in excess of £150 million, and making the Locate in Scotland bureau the most admired and efficient inward investment organisation in western Europe?

Mr. Rifkind: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend. Locate in Scotland has indeed been particularly successful over the past two or three years in attracting major new investment, and I am happy to pay tribute to it.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Does the Secretary of State recall that Hall Russell shipyard was privatised by his Government and given its present ownership, and that he has a responsibility towards the work force? In an earlier reply his hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary said that the Scottish Development Agency was standing by to help if necessary, but is the Secretary of State aware that a meeting held yesterday was not very helpful in the circumstances? Will he agree to meet my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran) and me today to discuss the position as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Rifkind: I assure the hon. Gentleman that we have given continual and considerable support to Hall Russell over the last year. I think he knows that from his own experience. Of course, if either he or his hon. Friend wishes to put any particular points to me, or to my hon. Friend the Minister of State who deals with such matters, we shall be happy to hear them.

Mr. Bill Walker: When he meets the chairman and other members of the Scottish Development Agency, will my right hon. and learned Friend ask them to remind the Scottish business community continually that, because of our so-called "open-door" policy, inward investment in Scotland has been of great help, bringing many jobs and great prosperity? Will he point to the danger that any kind of ring fence—any attempt to make Scotland isolationist —would have the same effect that it had in Quebec of driving jobs and investment away?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is right. It would not only deter investment in Scotland, but ultimately prevent Scottish companies from expanding elsewhere in the United Kingdom and overseas. The Scottish economy and that of the United Kingdom as a whole has always benefited from a willingness to employ sensible trading and investment policies of the kind to which my hon. Friend referred.

Health Boards (Funding)

17. Mr. Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any plans to increase the funding allocations to health boards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: An additional £12·7 million has been allocated to the National Health Service in Scotland to cover the extra cost of this year's nurses' clinical regrading. This brings the total of additional funding to cover the cost of review body pay awards to £104·7 million. After taking account of centrally funded expenditure, the additional sum distributed to health boards amounts to £93·4 million.

Mr. Kennedy: Will the Minister take on board the fact that in the Highland health board area, and no doubt in every other health board area in Scotland, many nurses are deeply concerned about the proposed clinical regrading and will be appealing against the grades that they have been allocated? Will he also bear in mind that in the Highland health board area specifically, many patients, particularly on Skye and the west coast and in the more rural or isolated communities, find it very difficult to cope with the changes in patient expenses for travelling to the centre of excellence in Raigmore hospital? Does he accept that that is a financially based problem for the health board in which he should have legitimate interest, with a view to further funding?

Mr. Forsyth: I have asked the Highland health board to reimburse patients for the costs incurred, and I regret that that was not done over a period of some months. I have asked the board to see that money is made available to any patients who were not treated fairly.

The hon. Gentleman must appreciate that under the Government nurses' pay has risen by 44 per cent. in real terms, while the Labour Government cut it by 20 per cent. If nurses are concerned about their grading, there is an appeal process. However, I am entitled to point out that the majority of sisters in hospitals in Scotland will have a pay rise of between £2,000 and £3,000 a year. By any standard, that is a major contribution to the Health Service and a major recognition of their work. What a pity that the hon. Gentleman cannot bring himself to recognise that.

Scottish Development Agency

18. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairman of the Scottish Development Agency; and what matters were discussed.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend and I met the chairman and board of the agency on 16 May to discuss strategic issues which might be reflected in the agency's planning and budgeting process, and other matters.

Dr. Godman: I hope that when the Secretary of State next meets that estimable Greenockian, he will give him an assurance vis-a-vis the Hughes proposals that the SDA will continue in its present role in the Scottish economy. Is it not the case that the agency's area projects must be allowed to continue their valuable work? I remind the Minister that the Inverclyde initiative has financed and supported the Inverclyde training trust, which provides unemployed people with the skills that they will need in the enterprise zone. In that regard, the Inverclyde initiative and the Inverclyde training trust are surely an advance on Mr. Hughes and his proposals.

Mr. Lang: The Inverclyde enterprise zone and the Inverclyde initiative represent major initiatives by the Government, administered by the Scottish Development Agency. The budget for the agency next year is £150 million. We have made it clear that we see a continuing role for the agency within the exciting prospect of the new developments that we are contemplating under the Scottish Enterprise title.

Student Support (White Paper)

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Baker): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement about future arrangements for student support.

Two years ago I set up a review of student support to examine how the maintenance needs of students may be met. We have the most generous system of student support in the western world, yet fewer of our young people enter higher education than in other European countries.

In our 1987 election manifesto we said that the purpose of the review was to improve the overall prospects of students so that more are encouraged to enter higher education. We specifically mentioned top-up loans to supplement grants as one way of bringing in new finance to help students and to relieve pressure on their parents.

The review has now been completed. We believe that the cost of student maintenance should be shared more equitably between students, their parents and the taxpayer. The Government are therefore today publishing a White Paper which sets out our proposals to introduce a scheme of top-up loans for students. We propose that from 1990, in addition to their grant, all home students in full-time higher education, except postgraduates, will be eligible for a top-up loan averaging over £400 in a full year.

This top-up loan facility will not be means-tested. Students will be able to take up as much or as little of it as they wish. The present grant arrangements will continue, but the overall levels of grant will be frozen in cash terms at their 1990 levels. As the grant also incorporates in most cases a parental contribution, this means that over time the average parent will be paying less in real terms. From 1990, students' total resources in grant and top-up loan will continue to be reviewed annually. Any uprating to reflect cost increases will be applied only to the top-up loan facility until the top-up loan has risen to the same level as the grant and parental contribution taken together.

The top-up loans will not bear a commercial rate of interest. Under the Government's proposals, top-up loans will be offered at a real interest rate of zero. The principal to be repaid will be uprated each year in line with inflation. Repayments will not start until the April after students complete their courses. Furthermore, repayments will be deferred when a graduate's income is low for any reason.

In 1985, the Government announced their intention to remove students from the social security system. Accordingly, the Government will end the general eligibility of students for social security benefits, whether or not they qualify for top-up loans. Benefits will, however, continue to be available for students who are disabled or single parents, and for students' dependants.

The level of the top-up loan will more than compensate the great majority of students for any loss of benefit. We estimate that the average level of social security benefit which would otherwise be claimed in 1990-91 is about £150. That compares with our loan facility of £420 in that year.

I recognise, however, that there may be local circumstances in which some further help may be needed, and postgraduate and further education students will not have access to loans. I will establish, therefore, three access funds, each of £5 million, to provide support on a discretionary basis to students in special financial need. The funds will be for postgraduates, other students in higher education, and students in further education. Their operation will be reviewed after three years. They will be administered by the colleges, central institutions, polytechnics and universities throughout the United Kingdom; these institutions are best placed to understand the circumstances of their students.

The terms of the top-up loan scheme we are proposing are much more favourable than those of the borrowing on which many students rely at present. And instead of students having to rely on a social security system which was never designed for them, we shall be providing appropriate discretionary arrangements to help those in real need. This is a major step forward to achieving our target of more young people going into higher education.

In the Government's view, the top-up loan scheme is best administered by the financial institutions. I am now embarking on discussions with them. I shall also consult the funding councils and representatives of the local authorities and the higher and further education institutions about the other aspects of my proposals. The Government will bring forward a short Bill to allow the new regime to be introduced from autumn 1990.

These proposals represent an important step away from the dependency culture. Students will have a financial stake in their own future, and this will encourage greater economic awareness and self-reliance. The burden of student support on taxpayers and parents will be reduced. For the first time there will be a guaranteed extra source of income for students over and above their grants and parental contributions. By introducing top-up loans, we fulfil the undertaking we gave in our manifesto at the last election.

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): This White Paper will reduce access to higher education, increase student and parental debt and deter many students from entering higher education. It proposes that knowledge be mortgaged in the future.

Is it not to the shame of the Secretary of State that this document contains no significant proposals for dealing with the real scandal—the numbers of young people who are forced out of education at 16-plus because of financial and other pressures? Is the Secretary of State aware, that when the grant system was reasonably funded in the 1960s and 1970s, there was a significant increase in access for lower income homes? Does he not know that the grant system gave many of us our only chance of higher education, and that he is now seeking to deny to others opportunities which even many Ministers had for themselves?

Is not the principal reason why working-class participation has levelled off in the 1980s the Government's appalling record of having cut student grants by 20 per cent. in real terms, increased the burden on parents and reduced the number of home students at university between 1980 and 1986?

The Secretary of State's hon. Friend, the Under-Secretary of State, told us last week that public expenditure constraints have been so severe that they "must inevitably lead to the progressive degradation" of our finest universities. I quote the hon. Gentleman's document.

Will the Secretary of State confirm that it is simply fraudulent to describe the loans as top-up loans? He is not topping up the grant system but pulling it down. Will he confirm that he aims to replace at least half the grant and parental contribution with a loan? Will he confirm that the suggestion he made in the statement that parents will pay less in real terms is wholly misleading? If the parental contribution scale is frozen, many parents will have to pay significantly more. How does imposing such high burdens of debt on students and their parents square with the Prime Minister's injunction that people must be taught to live within their means?

Will the Secretary of State give the House a categorical assurance that the loans will not be extended to vouchers and tuition fees, as proposed in the Jackson memorandum? Will not such loans hit women disproportionately hard? Why does the Secretary of State not have the guts to admit that, as the Jackson papers have already told us, in private the Government care nothing about increased access and that the whole policy has been driven by the Chancellor's obsession with cutting public spending? Was the Tory Reform Group not correct to say that a loan scheme would "reduce . . . access to higher education . . . lower standards and . . . produce a new class of poor graduates"?

Is it not true that the Secretary of State has failed to provide better opportunities for people at 16-plus, at 18-plus and in adulthood and has failed to improve the nation's skills? Instead of moving towards the 21st century, the proposals take us back to the 19th century. The Secretary of State has betrayed the nation's future.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) will want to study the proposals in detail. In reply to the point that he made about saving Government expenditure, I draw his attention to the fact that the net cost of the scheme to the Treasury will be £850 million, so there will be an increase in Government expenditure. I refer the hon. Gentleman to annex E of the White Paper, which contains a table showing the amount of money that will build up for the rest of the century.

In defending the present system, the hon. Gentleman is defending the indefensible. He is defending a system that has actually restricted access to higher education. The previous Labour Government, which the hon. Gentleman supported, not only restricted access but cut access to higher education and cut the number of students. The hon. Gentleman is defending a system in which 35 per cent. of students do not receive the full parental contribution.

Page 15 of the White Paper deals with parental contribution. We propose that from 1990, the grant plus parental contribution should be frozen and all increases applied to the loan top-up facility. The contribution scale will be changed to ensure that parental contribution does not rise to take up the entire amount. The chart shows that. After the scheme has been introduced, parents will be paying a substantially reduced amount to support their own children in higher education.

The hon. Gentleman was dismissive about the scheme. I remind him of the comments being made in higher education circles. The Times Higher Education Supplement —no supporter of the Government—says:

"The grant or loan debate is virtually over. The case for loans now has an unstoppable momentum."

The hon. Gentleman said this afternoon, and to the papers this morning, that Ministers have benefited from the present system yet want to end the system from which they themselves have benefited. I had a means-tested award which I supplemented from my own savings. I had saved money during my period of national service. I also worked during the vacations. Many of my generation would have been very glad indeed to have the facility of a top-up loan on the terms that I have announced.

I remind the hon. Gentleman of the positive advantage of the system. It will provide a guaranteed extra source of income for students, over and above their present grants. It will reduce the burden on parents, who are already hard pressed. We are establishing three access funds and giving institutions the chance to tailor packages to attract more students.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the numbers staying on at 16. In three or four days' time, I shall be publishing more statistics showing that the number of children staying on at 16 has increased from 32 per cent. to 48 per cent., and that is the important point. The Government have increased the number of students in higher education by nearly 200,000 since we came to office. However, we cannot go much further by relying on the present system, and that is why we are committed to change.

The Labour party is committed to nothing in this matter. I consulted its manifesto this morning and it had nothing at all to say about students and student support. I challenge the hon. Member for Blackburn to tell us what his policy will be. He has been in charge of Labour's education policy for two years now and there is no such policy. Labour's education policy is a vacuum filled by Straw.

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the scheme, which is both sensitive and fair. Having said that, I should like to offer a little destructive criticism. At the centre of the debate is access. There are three aspects to access. The first aim is to get the mix of grants and loans right, and I think that my right hon. Friend has done that. The second and far more important aim is to improve the quality of schools, and my right hon. Friend is doing that. But there is a third aspect, to which I attach great importance, because the Government seem to want——

Hon. Members: What is the question?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am aware that the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) has some interest in this matter. However, there is to be a debate and I would ask him now to come to his question.

Mr. Walden: What is the attitude of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to the third aspect of access? It seems that the Government wish to generate a new generation of media morons by their broadcasting policy. I do not understand how that fits in with what my right hon. Friend proposes for the good of access or with what he is doing for schools. That is far more important for the promotion of social fairness than the mere mechanics of loans or grants.

Mr. Baker: I thank my hon. Friend for the work that he did on the student review when he was Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science. I also thank him for his support for the scheme that I have announced and for the reforms that we have been introducing in the education system. On my hon. Friend's last point about media morons, I do not believe that the proposals of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary for the reform of television will necessarily lead to falling standards. There are various ways in which standards can be improved within those proposals, but that goes rather wider than the matters in my statement.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Will the Secretary of State not admit that his announcement reveals that the Thatcherite monetarist wolf has at last been admitted to the Department of Education and Science, and that the hidden agenda is now revealed? Will the Secretary of State tell us what he proposes to do about tuition fees—the other item for which students may be asked to pay in the coming months?

Is it true that students will no longer even be statistics for social security purposes and that they will not qualify—except for discretionary awards—no matter how low their income? Why did the Secretary of State say not one word about increasing access or about the fact that the proposal represents the biggest disincentive to students from poor and working families to go on to higher education that has been announced since the second world war?

Mr. Baker: I should perhaps have replied to the hon. Member for Blackburn on the question of tuition fees. I said at Question Time yesterday:

"There is a great debate on the funding of higher education, both here and overseas. There is also a growing desire among institutions for greater independence. The Government have no proposals for students in receipt of mandatory awards to contribute part of their tuition fees, but higher education institutions have a legal right to charge tuition fees, and to prevent them doing so would require legislation."—[Official Report, 8 November 1988; Vol. 140, c. 155.]

I have made it clear that I wish to see that debate mature and develop. It has nothing to do with the White Paper that I have put before the House.

With regard to access, the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) must address the fact that other countries with schemes of grants and loans have very much higher records of access than we have. One of the features of our education system is that student support in the United Kingdom is uniquely high. At the 1984 prices given in the White Paper, it is £750 per student in the United Kingdom compared with £70 in West Germany, £180 in France and £30 in Japan. Yet in all those countries a higher proportion of children, especially from blue-collar families, go into higher education than is the case in this country.

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his statement will be widely welcomed, especially by the 70 per cent. of parents who currently make a parental contribution? Will he confirm that the loan will be in addition to the grant prevailing at the time of its inception? With regard to the view expressed by the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) that children from blue-collar families will be dissuaded from taking up higher education, I do not take that view, but I should be pleased to hear my right hon. Friend's comments on that point.

Mr. Baker: I re-emphasise what I said to the hon. Member for Blackburn. We are reducing the burden on parents and taxpayers. Chart 8 on page 15 of the White Paper sets out the effect. Over time, the parental contributions will come down by nearly half. That will be a great help to many hard-pressed parents and their children.

I confirm that the loans will be in addition to the grants. I have already announced the increase in grant for 1989-90. There will be a further increase in 1990-91. That level will then be frozen and the loans will be on top of that.

On the very important question of access, I have already said that it is good news for this country that a higher proportion of children of 16-plus are staying on at school. That must be welcomed in all parts of the House. It is a very significant increase—up to 47 per cent. of the age band for 1988. That increase is good news and it has grown strongly in the past few years. In terms of access to higher education, socio-economic groups C2, D and E constitute 61 per cent. of the 18-year-old population in this country but supply only 21 per cent. of university entrants and 27 per cent. of polytechnic entrants. For the universities, that proportion has remained static since about 1970, so the present system, to which the Labour party is wedded, has not increased the proportion from blue-collar families. That is what we want to do and I believe that that is what we shall achieve.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): I am disappointed with the White Paper. Is the Secretary of State increasing acess to education or merely to debt? If he were really interested in increasing access to education, he would have addressed the problem of mature women who are trying to get back into higher education and have to use the part-time and discretionary grant award scheme. Listening carefully to the right hon. Gentleman, it seems to me that no attention whatever has been paid to that aspect. For those women, the loss of all social security benefits and entitlements will be a major——

Mr. Speaker: Order. As I have said, there will be a debate on this. Will the hon. Lady please ask a question?

Ms. Armstrong: What real hope can the Secretary of State offer to mature women seeking to get back into higher education?

Mr. Baker: A growing number of mature students, both male and female, are now entering higher education. Many of them do not qualify for any sort of grant or, for one reason or another, for the various benefits of the social security system. I confirm that they will be eligible to participate in the loan scheme.

Dr. Keith Hampson (Leeds, North-West): Is it not true that despite the generosity of our grant system, the proportion of university entrants from the unskilled, manual worker category has steadily fallen? Does not the vast bulk of the higher education world know full well that no Government could indefinitely continue with the current system?

Although my hon. Friend's scheme is most welcome, will he take it further and abolish all parental contribution and make access to loans available to that critical group of part-time university and polytechnic students who currently receive no state help?

Mr. Baker: I am sure that some people will say that the scheme goes too far and others that it does not go far enough, so I probably have it about right.

I appreciate what my hon. Friend has said, but he is not quite right. There has not been a decline in the number of students from blue-collar families. As the White Paper shows, the number has risen slightly. The survey carried out for the Robbins committee shows that 3·2 per cent. of 21-year-olds whose parents were in manual occupations had entered full-time higher education by 1962. The comparable figure for 1985 was 6·9 per cent. It is a disappointing rate of progress over the years and, in some of our universities, it has not moved at all. Any increase has been mainly in polytechnics.

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glanford and Scunthorpe): Does the Secretary of State accept that many caring parents will not want their children to begin life with crippling debts around their necks and, instead, will make up the contributions? Will he admit that he is merely passing contributions on to parents at a time of crippling mortgage rates and a crisis in the rented housing sector? Will not many people start life with a disadvantage because his scheme will deter those in the lowest income groups from entering higher education? When the right hon. Gentleman talks about dependency, does he mean cutting income for the poor and cutting taxes for the rich? Is that his idea of the dependency culture?

Mr. Baker: I do not believe that parents will rush in to make up the loans for their children because about one third of parents already do not take up the full parental contribution. The children of those parents will be the major beneficiaries of the loan scheme.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): I congratulate my hon. Friend on his excellent statement. Is he aware that the nearest university to Europe—the university of Kent at Canterbury—is to have a seminar on this very subject next week? I shall regard it as a privilege to put the case for removing a proportion of the burden that currently rests on taxpayers—many of whom are poor people—and placing it on those of us who were privileged to enjoy university education.

Mr. Baker: I thank my hon. Friend for his support. The whole essence of the scheme is that the burden on the taxpayer and the parent will be reduced.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Having been a teacher for 27 years, may I assure the right hon. Gentleman that young people stay at school after the age of 16 because they have no other choice? There are no jobs for them. May I lodge a protest about the scheme on behalf of the poor families in Northern Ireland, which has the highest unemployment rate in the United Kingdom? They cannot afford to support their able children so that they can benefit from education and escape from the poverty trap. Will the right hon. Gentleman take account of the special difficulties and needs of students in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Baker: The proposals that I have announced relate to the whole of the United Kingdom. Many students are prepared to make an investment in their future. When graduates leave college, in whatever part of the United Kingdom, they go into much better and higher paid jobs than do many others in our society. The average is very much higher. An analysis in the White Paper shows the return to an individual student from engaging in higher education to be about 25 per cent., which is a very high return. We are inviting students to make an investment in their future and I believe that many will do so, from whatever part of the United Kingdom they might come.

Sir Rhodes Boyson (Brent, North): Does my right hon. Friend agree that practically every other country in the free world has a loans system? Will he consider introducing a travel loan system so that Labour education spokesmen can visit Sweden, which is by no means a Conservative country and has an excellent loans system?

Mr. Baker: The Swedish system started out in the way that I am proposing today. In the 1960s the Swedish Government decided to freeze grants, as I propose today, and to introduce top-up loans. They let that system run on to the present system where only 10 per cent. of the expenditure is on grants and 90 per cent. on loans. They went too far and are now increasing the grant element back to 30 per cent. We are proposing that grant and loans together—[Interruption.] Let me answer one point at a time—will balance out at 50:50. Student support will be provided half by loans and half by grants and parental contribution. The default rate in Sweden is about 1 per cent.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): It is always interesting to hear the Secretary of State pretending that a draconian cut in education is progressive. Is it not a fact that the serried ranks behind him, due to the riches of mummy and daddy, are bound to—[Interruption.] That is the reality. Is it not a fact that our record on young people staying on in education after 16 compared with that of the great countries of the world is appalling? We are at the bottom by miles. Japan and the United States have twice——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Questions, please.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman talked about our position in relation to the great countries of the world. I remind him that in France the percentage of university entrants from blue collar groups rose from 23 per cent. in 1975 to 30 per cent. in 1980, although the cost of higher education in our country, where we have had no increase, is four times greater than the cost in France.

Mr. Malcolm Thornton (Crosby): As one who has expressed concern over the way in which the present system has failed to meet the needs of students, may I welcome the fact that the Government have grasped this nettle? Nevertheless, we are concerned about access and the effects that increasing debt may have on students. I was interested in my right hon. Friend's comments on the conversations that he will have with banks and institutions. We are bothered about the mechanics of the scheme. Can he tell the House how he expects these conversations to go and to what purpose?

Mr. Baker: The Government firmly believe that it would be better for the scheme to be operated by banks, building societies and other financial institutions than by some Government quango. I am now entering into discussions about that, but there are certain parameters to any scheme that I set out. The obligation to repay the loan should spend on the income of the graduate. That is to say that a student who has a low-paid job on graduation should have his obligation to repay the loan suspended until he reaches a certain pay level. That part of the paper is rather green and there are various suggested alternatives. That is particularly important for women graduates who get married and have no source of income.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): Hear, hear.

Mr. Baker: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for her support.

Secondly, the loan will be written off and cancelled either 25 years after it has been incurred or if the person has reached 50. Naturally there will be no recovery of loan should a graduate die. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] We shall cancel it out. Thirdly, the obligation to repay the loan will not start until the April after the student has finished the course, which will probably be the previous June.

Mr. David Blunkett (Sheffield, Brightside): Is the Secretary of State saying that longevity or the ability to string out repayment will be an advantage in not repaying the loan? Is he telling the House that taxpayers would rather subsidise financial institutions through lower interest rates than invest directly in the future of both young people and this country? Far from a culture of access, this is a culture of Visa and American Express.

Mr. Baker: It is the student who will be subsidised in that the student will not have to pay the going commercial rate for the loan, which students must pay on their overdrafts at present. Surely the hon. Gentleman would agree with that. It is part and parcel of the scheme. I should add that if there has been a deliberate attempt to string out a loan or to default, it will not be cancelled when the person reaches 50. We thought that that proposal would make the scheme slightly more attractive.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Can my right hon. Friend say whether the repayment of the loans will be less at the beginning and greater towards the end? Will he confirm that the net cost of the scheme to the Government will be greater than the present one?

Mr. Baker: I have already made it clear that the scheme will involve considerable cost in the initial years. My hon. Friend asked about the length of repayment. On page 16 of the White Paper we set out a provisional scheme for how repayment builds up. We envisage that for £1,396 over three years there will be a repayment of about £300 a year for about five years. It is possible that repayment of larger debts will take longer than five years. We do not rule out the possibility of offering a discount for prompt payment, as offered under the German scheme. That is part of the discussions that we shall have with the banks.

Mrs. Rosie Barnes (Greenwich): Does the Secretary of State agree that in order to increase the uptake of higher education, particularly among lower income students, the staying-on rate at 16 must be markedly increased? Will he consider introducing a means-tested benefit for 16 to 19-year-olds to encourage children from lower income families to stay on at school rather than leave to supplement their own and their family's income?

Mr. Baker: That proposal was put forward by the hon. Lady's party at the general election, and in the past the Labour party has toyed with a payment at 16. First, it is expensive. Unmeans-tested, it would cost £700 million to £800 million; means-tested, it would be less. Secondly, the idea of means-testing boys and girls at school, with some receiving payment and others not, is unattractive.

The real argument against the hon. Lady's case is that we are already getting more young people staying on at 16. The rise to 48 per cent. of that age band is encouraging and is happening now.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that his commitment to equality of opportunity of access for all to higher education is underlined by the fact that there is no tuition fees element in this package? Will he ensure that there is none in future? Can he confirm that the average student in higher education today borrows about £340, so we already have loans on that basis? Can we look for some considerable improvement in the student grant in 1990 when this new scheme is introduced?

Mr. Baker: We published a profile of student expenditure in the White Paper and I recall that that is at present about the average level of a student overdraft.

My hon. Friend asked about access. I remind him that many years ago, in his famous report, Robbins stated that when many parents were only just beginning to acquire the habit of contemplating higher education for such of their children, especially girls, as were capable of benefiting by it, it was probable that a system of loan would have an undesirable disincentive effect. But that if as time went on the habit became more firmly established, the arguments of justice and distribution and of the advantage of encouraging individual responsibilty might come to weigh more heavily and lead to some experiment in that direction.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Does the Secretary of State accept that in areas of high unemployment and low income—where no holiday jobs are available and where there may be a cultural reluctance to take on loans—as a result of today's statement students who have the ability to go on to higher education will not do so? How does that encourage the development of education?

Mr. Baker: I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the blue pages at the back of the White Paper, where there is an analysis of the reluctance of various socio-economic groups to take on loans. I remind the hon. Gentleman that various groups of students who do not benefit from grants will do so from the loan. At present, 50,000 students at universities or polytechnics doing mainly professional courses of one sort or another do not qualify for a grant, but they will for the loan. Students who do not qualify for awards of any sort will benefit from the loan. Students whose awards are abated and whose parents do not make up the full amount will benefit from the loan. I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the three access funds that I am establishing. I am giving money to universities, polytechnics and colleges so that they can devise various access courses and packages, scholarships and bursaries of their own.

Mr. David Curry (Skipton and Ripon): Is not one of the principal differences between our system of higher education and that of the continent the fact that many students on the continent attend local universities, live at home and are maintained by their parents? Is that one of the reasons why there is greater access of blue collar workers on the continent? As our present system has failed in that regard, is it not good sense to change it?

Mr. Baker: I do not think that that change will be implicit in the scheme. The pattern here may change over the years, but I confirm that on the continent there is a greater pattern of students studying at their local universities. Students here shop around the country, which substantially adds to the expense of our higher education system.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): Will the Secretary of State confirm that one of the major reasons for the failure to open access to unskilled children is the way in which the grant has been cut since the end of the 1960s? Will he look at the access figures for unskilled children for 1955, 1965, 1975 and 1985 and note what has happened as the value of the grant has decreased? How much in real terms will the grant be worth to each student in 2027—the last year for which we have figures in the White Paper—compared with its value in 1962, when I began my university career?

Mr. Baker: I should need some notice to give figures for the period between 1962 and 2027. I shall endeavour to extract them for the hon. Gentleman and write to him. The hon. Gentleman asked me to make various comparisons between the years and I shall do so, but I am sure that the pattern will show that access has remained static. I remind him that under the present system we spend more on student support from public funds than comparable countries. We spend more per student, more as a proportion of higher education current expenditure, more as a proportion of total current expenditure for education and more as a proportion of gross national product. We are spending much more than other countries through a combination of grants and loans, which attract more people into higher education.

Dame E. Kellett-Bowman: Will my right hon. Friend accept that I am delighted that he has so carefully safeguarded the position of women who marry, have children and therefore do not repay the loan until they are in receipt of a reasonable income? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the participation rate of manual and blue collar workers would be infinitely higher if the Labour party had not destroyed grammar schools, from which many members of the Shadow Cabinet benefited before entering university?

Mr. Baker: My hon. Friend broadens the argument rather considerably. I do not want to go back into history as I prefer to talk about the future. I am sure that the various changes we are putting in hand through the Education Reform Act 1988 will substantially improve the quality of education in the future.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am bound to have regard to the other business on the Order Paper. We shall be dealing with Lords amendments to two important Bills and the House need only look at the selection list to appreciate how much work we have to do. I shall allow questions to continue for another 15 minutes, but I ask hon. Members to keep their questions as brief as possible so that brief answers may be given.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): What assessment has been made of the effects of this scheme on teacher recruitment? As the vice-chancellors are extremely concerned about the quality of teacher recruitment, may we have the names of the vice-chancellors who support the scheme?

Mr. Baker: As far as I know, no vice-chancellor has seen the scheme because it has been prepared and made available to the House today. What the hon. Gentleman might be referring to are the views that have been advanced by various vice-chancellors in the continuing debate on the funding of higher education institutions. We are reviewing teacher recruitment. Clearly it is one of my responsibilities to ensure a good flow of teachers over the coming decade for the introduction of the national curriculum. We shall bring forward proposals to deal with that.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): Do the changes in student support mean that the Government think that there should be a change in the length of university terms and degree courses? If that happened, it would have an impact on student finances.

Mr. Baker: That is a separate matter. It is interesting that higher education institutions are more flexible about the nature of a degree course. The traditional degree course of three years for one subject has given way in many universities to combined subjects. I visited a university last week that is combining with its local polytechnic to have a master of science course over four years. That is an interesting development whereby students can cross from polytechnic to university on a combined course. I want to encourage such an experiment, not chill it off. There is nothing implicit in the scheme about the length of degree courses.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I have known the Secretary of State for 18 years. Is he aware that it is pathetic to listen to him introducing such extreme Right-wing ideas on higher education? The Secretary of State mentioned loans, but does he understand that many students who will need the loan will not ask for it because they will know full well that they will be unable to repay it? However the Secretary of State dresses up this scheme, it is a deliberate attempt to exclude from university education youngsters in lower socio-economic groups. When three years ago at the Tory party conference the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) said that the Tory party was determined to write off the education prospects of generations of youngsters, he could never have dreamt for a minute that his former parliamentary private secretary would introduce such a scheme.

Mr. Baker: I am astonished to hear these proposals described as extreme Right-wing ideas. Does the hon. Gentleman appreciate that Socialist Sweden did this in the 1960s? Does he appreciate that the Labour Government of Australia are going much further than this scheme and are introducing a tax on students for their tuition fees? Does he realise that the Labour Government of New Zealand are proposing a tax on students? Many people will say that my scheme is rather modest compared to those proposals.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): I welcome this reform of the system—despite expenditure five times greater than the European average, it has failed with regard to blue collar access—but does the Secretary of State agree that it will not only improve access but give students more investment in their education, from which they will benefit financially in the future, and will lead to a more flexible form of funding for continuous higher education throughout life, which will become more important in the future?

Mr. Baker: The flexibility point is important. We are leaving it to the institutions, universities and polytechnics to decide how they should operate their access funds. That will introduce a degree of flexibility. I hope that many imaginative ideas will come forward from them on tailored packages of support for particular types of courses and particular students. I am sure that that will lead to more of our young people going into our colleges, polytechnics and universities.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): It would appear that, even in the damper regions of the Department of Education and Science, the barbarians are through the gates. This is a Government who know the price of everything and the value of nothing. Is the Secretary of State aware that there are already student loans, and they are called bank overdrafts? Hundreds of student constituents of mine are up to their ears in debt. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the Robbins principle. Is he happy that he will go down in history as having replaced the Robbins principle with the begging bowl Baker principle of higher education?

Mr. Baker: I quoted from Robbins, who clearly foresaw the introduction of a loan. The hon. Gentleman attacks our proposals. What is the Labour party's policy?

Mrs. Maureen Hicks (Wolverhampton, North-East): Is it not fair to say that the opportunity of top-up loans will further enhance the opportunities for students by making them more responsible for their actions, more appreciative of the opportunity to go to university or college and, most of all, more selective in their choice of course so that it can match the job market when they come out of college or university?

Mr. Baker: I could not have put it better myself. I agree with my hon. Friend.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): The hon. Lady means that only the rich will have a choice.

Mr. Baker: Not at all. The hon. Gentleman was not in the Chamber when I made my statement and answered most of the questions, so I ask him to read the White Paper.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Hicks) said that we are inviting students to make a financial investment in their future. It is right to do that, because those students will move into substantially higher paid jobs. With greater responsibility, they can much better decide the kind of courses they want to undertake. We want to ensure that the system is sufficiently flexible for them to have a wider choice.

Mr. Terry Fields (Liverpool, Broadgreen): Would it not have been more honest for the Secretary of State to say, "The message for working class families and youth is that there is no future in our system. We do not need an educated working class, so we are putting barriers on access to higher education for working people"? Will the right hon. Gentleman take it from me that youth and students will fight him, and other Labour Members and I will join them to defeat this class-based legislation?

Mr. Baker: I am sure that there is no meaningless barricade that is not filled by the hon. Gentleman. I ask him to compare the recruitment figures for the Liverpool polytechnic and the Liverpool university under the Conservatives with the recruitment figures under Labour.

Mr. Tim Janman (Thurrock): My right hon. Friend is to be congratulated on bringing forward these long overdue proposals. Does he agree that the current cost of the many thousands of students who take out overdraft facilities because their parents do not make up the contribution is far higher than the zero real interest rate which my right hon. Friend has announced in what essentially amounts to a formalisation of the current system? Does my right hon. Friend agree that his announcement will increase access? Can he quantify that increase in access? Finally——

Mr. Speaker: Not "finally". In fairness to other hon. Members, three questions are enough.

Mr. Baker: As I have said, since 1979 there has been a substantial increase of nearly 200,000 students. We have set ourselves a target of increasing, in the lifetime of this Parliament, by 50,000 the number of higher education students. I think that we are likely to reach that target this year, two years before the next election. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Is that not good news? Is not the Labour party glad to know that there will be 50,000 more students in higher education and there are still two more glorious years to run, perhaps three—I am not announcing the date of the election.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Janman) for his support. My proposal will certainly lead to more access. We have set ourselves high targets, and we shall reach them.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): The Secretary of State will recall that he recently visited Leicester university. He will remember that for two reasons: first, he was hit by a very large pot of yogurt—which I deplore, because it was a waste of yogurt—and, secondly, he had a meeting with the president of the students union in Leicester, who spoke about the fact that students at Leicester university were suffering from the low grants. Given the Government's obsession with polling and market research, can the right hon. Gentleman point to a single piece of research that will show hon. Members the likely outcome of these proposals on access to further education? How many student organisations did the right hon. Gentleman consult before he wrote these proposals?

Mr. Baker: I was delighted to meet the hon. Gentleman in Leicester, but I am sorry that he was not walking with me shoulder and shoulder through his supporters.

I have answered several times the point about access. I confidently expect that the numbers in higher education, in polytechnics and universities will increase because of our proposals. The numbers have increased consistently over the past few years and will continue to increase. We are providing a possibility of greater resources for the great bulk of students.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): I welcome my right hon. Friend's announcement generally which will leave the overwhelming majority of students far better off. I particularly welcome the proposal for access funds which will be set up to provide for the hard cases which are inevitable. My right hon. Friend said that these funds would be administered by the higher education institutions. Within what criteria established by my right hon. Friend will those institutions administer those funds?

Mr. Baker: I want to give only the broadest guidance because I want to leave as much discretion as possible in the institutions' hands. It is a novel feature of our proposals that we regularly provide the universities and institutions with funds of their own, whereby they can provide their own scholarships and bursaries and tailor-make certain proposals for particular types of courses for particular students. Universities used to do that in the past to some extent and some universities around the world do it. Under the American system, where there is much more access throughout the social classes, it is common for universities and colleges to have quite large funds of this sort so that they can tailor particular proposals for particular students. It is for individual students to approach individual universities and polytechnics and come forward with their own proposals. I am sure that eventually Labour Front-Bench Members will support that.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is not the reason why well-heeled Conservatives want these changes the fact that many of them are making maximum contributions, and they want to save money? That is what Tories have told me. Is it not true that, under the Government's scheme, Tories will have an excuse for saying to their kids, "Take out a loan and fund your education, because I shall not pay for you any more"? This is the real reason behind the proposals: the Conservatives do not want to dig into their pockets.

Mr. Baker: That is an extraordinary proposition. The hon. Gentleman has supported a Government whose actions led to parents digging into their own pockets. The grant was means-tested under Labour and it is means-tested now. This means that a third of parents do not dig into their pockets and make a full parental contribution. As my hon. Friend the Member for Thurrock (Mr. Janman) rightly said, this loan facility means that young people will be able to make up the amount which is not made up by their parents.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Does my right hon. Friend accept that his statement will be warmly welcomed, especially by those on non-mandatory courses? Will he therefore ignore the brickbats made of straw? Does he recognise that most people realise that access to higher education greatly increases a person's earning capacity and that most people would be pleased to be offered a loan at a nil rate of interest?

Mr. Baker: I am sure of that and I am sure that there will be a substantial take-up of the loan. I completely agree with my hon. Friend's earlier comments. The loan will be taken up. Many people will realise that they are making a good investment in their future. I confirm that graduates' earnings are much higher than average earnings.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): Does the Secretary of State appreciate that he is defenceless against the accusation that these proposals are highly detrimental to the interests of the children of working-class families? Does he also appreciate that even Korea, in percentage terms, trains more of its youngsters than we do? When will the Secretary of State and his Government recognise that if we are to build a successful economy we need to train all our bright youngsters, irrespective of social considerations?

Mr. Baker: I agree with the hon. Gentleman, but he has to address the question why we have such a substantially expensive system of student support that is not achieving the objectives that he wants. Countries that have much less expensive systems of student support have a very much higher proportion of students in higher education. Only 10 per cent. of that age group in the United Kingdom study for degrees, compared with 20 per cent. in France, 15 per cent. in West Germany and 25 per cent. in Japan. All those countries have some system of grants and loans.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): My right hon. Friend knows that there is much greater access to higher education in the United States and that many students work their way through college. Will he put into perspective the proposed loans? Almost the first thing that most students do when they graduate in this country and get a job is to go to their bank manager for a loan to buy a car.

Mr. Baker: I am sure that that happens. My hon. Friend's comparison with America is interesting. There is a very much higher level of borrowing at all levels of access in America. It has led to many more young people in America going to college; that is one of the successes of the American system. I want many more of our young people to go to college, and I am quite sure that that will be the result of the proposals that I have announced.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I can see no mention in the White Paper of the number of additional students that the Secretary of State thinks will gain access to higher education. Can he tell the House how many students he thinks there will be as a result of his proposals?

Will the right hon. Gentleman also confirm that he is taking away the right of students to claim housing benefit, unemployment benefit and income support? Will he admit that for very many students that means that they will be £275 worse off and that the loan will only just about cover their benefits? Is he not setting up a special student social fund under which students will have to repay benefits rather than receive them? Will the Secretary of State also confirm that, while better-off parents will contribute rather less, those on lower incomes will progressively have to make a greater contribution to student grants?

In the Government's plastic society, far from students getting their flexible friend, the Baker card will be a visa to 25 years of debt. It will certainly not be a passport to greater access.

Mr. Baker: The hon. Gentleman's final remarks were a trifle strained and a trifle contrived. As for his important questions about disentitlement to benefit, our estimate is that in 1991 the average, spread over all students, that they will claim in benefits will be about £150. However, we estimate that about 50 per cent. of students will not claim. For those students who do claim, our estimate is that the figure comes out at just below £300. The figure that we are recommending for the first year is an additional loan facility of £420. For the second year, it will be £504. They will have greater access to an even larger amount of money.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall not take points of order now; I am on my feet. May I say to those hon. Members whom I have not called that I hope that there will be an opportunity to debate this matter—possibly during the debate on the Loyal Address—when I shall give them precedence.

Earth Tremors (Stoke-on-Trent)

4.33 pm

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the need for a full and thorough investigation into recent earth tremors in the north part of the city of Stoke-on-Trent."

This week's earth tremor affected people living in Smallthorne, Bradeley, High lane, Mill Hill and Chell. It measured a magnitude of 1·9 on the Richter scale and is the third tremor—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Ms. Walley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This may not be an earth-shattering matter for hon. Members, but it is certainly a matter of great concern to people in my constituency.

It is the third tremor in this small area in the last 12 months and it is the second in less than three weeks. Everybody who is affected is quite right to be distressed and concerned about the potential damage to their properties, and even more so when it appears that a pattern of earth tremors is now emerging.

We should be given every assistance to make sure that the area is being properly monitored and that the necessary national resources and equipment are on hand to enable the city of Stoke-on-Trent, the university of Keele's geography department and local residents to understand the extent of the problem and to establish whether there is a link between the current series of earth tremors and the abandonment of deep pit mining and changed Coal Board practices in that area.

The British Geological Survey is currently unable to provide Stoke-on-Trent with the detailed kind of monitoring that is required. I understand that the university of Keele has not yet received funding from the University Grants Committee to deploy seismic stations in the north part of Stoke-on-Trent.

Given the long history of earth tremors in this area, the lack of adequate monitoring equipment, which once was available in Stoke-on-Trent and has now been taken away, and the genuine concern and distress felt by people who are affected, detailed monitoring and analysis is urgently needed. Therefore I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House in order that we can have a full debate to make sure that these issues are immediately addressed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North (Ms. Walley) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that she believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the need for a full and thorough investigation into recent earth tremors in the north part of the city of Stoke-on-Trent."

I have listened with care and concern to what the hon. Lady has said, but I do not consider that the matter she has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20. I hope, however, that she will have other opportunities to bring the matter before the House.

Football Clubs (Membership Scheme)

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, referring to the behaviour of the Minister for Sport. He has treated this House with contemptuous disregard, both for its rights and its purposes, for the third time is succession, in making, or seeking to make, statements of great importance outside this House. He held a press conference at 3.30 pm when he should have been making an oral statement to the House on the subject of his football membership scheme.

Matters of considerable substance are involved in the Minister's statement. For example, it contains a completely unprecedented constitutional point. According to the scheme, the Minister for Sport proposes to insist that Scottish football supporters attending matches at Wembley or elsewhere in England should be required to register with an English or Welsh football club. That is an unparalleled proposal, it insults all Scottish football supporters and it will be completely impracticable.

The proposal also requires information about convicted persons to be supplied by the courts, fed into computers and used at football matches. You will know Mr. Speaker, that under British law it is unlawful for the courts or the police to provide information about convictions. That makes the Minister's proposals ludicrous in the extreme.

The proposals will also infringe civil liberties. The report contains nine objections from the football authorities. In those circumstances, I submit that the Minister should be required to make a statement to the House.

Mr. Speaker: If hon. Members look at the Order Paper, they will see what business is before us. I see no hope of any time being available for a statement to be made except perhaps very late tomorrow morning. Whether a Minister makes a statement to the House about any subject is not a matter for me. I know that hon. Members often feel annoyed that certain information is imparted by way of written answer rather than by oral statement, but statements eat into the time allotted to the main business of the day; and the Government must take responsibility for deciding how many there should be.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have a constitutional question. There has been absolutely no consultation in Scotland or any suggestion that this document has anything to do with Scotland——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have already ruled that this is not a matter for me.

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: As long as it is not on this matter.

Mr. Carlisle: My point of order concerns the courtesies of the House. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook spoke about the courtesies of the House and the Minister making a statement. I seek your guidance in regard to hon. Members obtaining a document by deceit, and going to sporting conferences. The right hon. Member——

Mr. Speaker: Order. What documents hon. Members get hold of is not a matter of order in the Chamber. I have already ruled that whether a statement is made is not a matter for me. The hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) has been here a good length of time. He must not disobey the Chair. I cannot take further points of order on this matter.

Mr. Carlisle: My point of order is not to do with the statement. It concerns whether it is in order for Privy Councillors to have documents such as this while they are embargoed and to publish and talk about them before the House has had an opportunity to hear what they are about. That is what the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook did today. He discussed and criticised this excellent document before it was announced in the House. Is it right that the House should not be given an opportunity to discuss the document first? Is it not a discourtesy to the House that the document has been taken and discussed before the Minister has had an opportunity even to answer the question on the Order Paper?

Mr. Speaker: Whether hon. Members get documents and how they get them is not a matter of order in the Chamber. I repeat that this is not a matter for me.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It was quite clear to every hon. Member that the hon. Member for Luton, North (Mr. Carlisle) said that my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Small Heath (Mr. Howell) obtained the report by deceit. I do not know whether that makes the Minister a liar as it was the Minister who supplied my right hon. Friend with the copy that he has with him. We would like you, Mr. Speaker, to ask the hon. Member for Luton, North to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Luton, North, who I think cheated on his point of order, used the word "deceit". I thought that he was referring to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley). Will he please withdraw the allegation?

Mr. John Carlisle: I consider it deceitful, but——

Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Please withdraw the allegation.

Mr. Carlisle: The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook has expressed——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I give the hon. Member one chance to withdraw the allegation.

Mr. Carlisle: I withdraw the allegation of deceit.

Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill

4.43 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is an entirely different matter and I do not think that it will raise hackles as much as the previous one. It is about what happened last night at about 9.50 pm. Madam Deputy Speaker took your place in the Chair. There was a likelihood of a closure motion, but it never materialised. The Ayes were called because nobody else stood up and there was no call. That appears in column 261 of Hansard for last night. Madam Deputy Speaker, as Seond Deputy Chairman said:

"As many as are of that opinion say Aye."

There was no answer. She continued,

"To the contrary No."

At column 262, Hansard records:

"Hon. Members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think that the Noes have it."

At that point, we had defeated the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill. The Tories realised that they had made a grave error. They had not shouted, but then they decided to shout, "Aye." which is recorded in Hansard accordingly. They were too late. Hansard continues:

"Madam Deputy Speaker: Clear the Lobbies."—[Official Report, 8 November 1988; vol. 140, c. 261-2.]

Since I have been a Member of Parliament, Governments of both parties have made mistakes, but on each occasion, as with the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill some time ago, if a mistake was made, the thing had to stand. In those circumstances, the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill would have had to start from scratch in the next Parliament, not halfway through its proceedings, as at present.

The Clerks told me last night that they were a bit unsure themselves, so I went to hear the tapes. They are quite clear. Before you make a decision, Mr. Speaker, I invite you to hear them. They are much clearer than I expected, bearing in mind the noise that can occur when a Division is being called for. There is not a single whisper of an Aye, but there are distinct Noes. We can all get copies of the tapes nowadays.

The Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill is important, and it was strongly contested by Opposition Members. We even had one or two Conservative Members support us in the Lobby. We cannot be messing about with procedures in the House when a Division is called and the Government make a mistake, or those who are promoting a Bill make a mistake. There is a question about who should have done the shouting, but the plain fact is that they did not deliver the voices. I am therefore asking you to listen to the tapes, Mr. Speaker. I think that you will find that Hansard has recorded it absolutely accurately. I believe that, in accordance with previous procedure, the Bill's progress should be halted and that if it is to go further, it should have to start again in the next Parliament.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Briefly, please. I think that it has all been said.

Mr. Redmond: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I request your understanding, tolerance and guidance, because I am a relatively new Member and I am unsure of our procedures. I am in no way criticising Madam Deputy Speaker for her error. We are all human and can honestly make mistakes. The rules of the House, however, are clearly laid down. If Conservative Members failed to follow the House's procedures correctly, the House's decision must still stand. Although Madam Deputy Speaker made a mistake, it is incumbent on you to consider what has been said and to rule that the Opposition were correct and that the Bill fell.

Mr. Speaker: I always look at Hansard, particularly when I have not been in the Chair. I have looked at Hansard to see what went on last night. I see that a point of order on this very matter was raised at the time by the Shadow Leader of the House and that the Deputy Speaker dealt with it. Thereafter, no further complaints were raised on the matter. If there was any concern about the matter, it should certainly have been raised last night, not now.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We cannot back-deal. There was an opportunity to deal with the matter last night. We cannot back-deal on a matter which the House has already resolved.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. This seems quite extraordinary to me. We raised a point of order at the time. We registered our concern and suggested that if the tapes were consulted they would show that what my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) has said is correct. I do this in no spirit of criticism of the Deputy Speaker, but this seems extraordinary to us. We raised the issue and raised the question of the tapes. They could not be heard immediately after the Division or while it was going on. Hon. Members have listened to the tapes and think that it would be right and proper for you to listen to them as well, as they bear out what my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover has asserted.

Mr. Speaker: The tapes are not the official record. I have regard to what appears in Hansard. I have no authority to overrule any decision which has been taken by the occupant of the Chair, and I do not propose to do so.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I have no power to overrule an earlier decision.

Mr. Cryer: You seem to be implying, Mr. Speaker, that there must be a range of points of order to give testimony and strength to what we are saying. Since the Division took place last night, this is the first time that you have been in the Chair and the first opportunity that we have had to raise points of order. The point was made clearly last night and we thought that it had been registered. This is the first moment that we have been in a position to raise the matter again because it is the first opportunity that we have to refer you to the record in Hansard. Like you, Mr. Speaker, we recognise that the House depends on Hansard. If a mistake has been made and that fact is demonstrated in Hansard, there must be some facility for rectifying the mistake and the decision that was taken by the House.

Mr. Speaker: I have no power to order that. The matter should have been pursued last night—[HON. MEMBERS: "It was."]—with the occupant of the Chair. It was so raised and it was dealt with. I have no power to overrule that.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you confirm that, after Madam Deputy Speaker said

"I think that the Noes have it", there appears the following line:

"Hon. Members: Aye.—[Official Report, 8 November 1988; Vol. 140, c. 262.]

Surely that solves the problem.

Mr. Speaker: I have read Hansard, and I see nothing out of order on this issue. Ten-minute Bill——

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Cohen. Ten-minute Bill. Mr. Harry Cohen.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman cannot raise a point of order on the issue with which I have dealt. I have dealt with it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. My point of order relates to what has been printed in yesterday's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: I have dealt with that. Ten-minute Bill.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Ten-minute Bill. Mr. Harry Cohen.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Cryer: It is an extremely important issue.

Mr. Speaker: It may be, but there is no precedent. It would be a precedent if I ruled on something which the Deputy Speaker did last night. Ten-minute Bill. Mr. Harry Cohen.

Mr. Redmond: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: We must not let him get away with it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Who must not let him get away with it?

Mr. Skinner: It is here in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: I have read yesterday's edition of Hansard.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Speaker: I shall hear what the hon. Member for Workington has to say, and that will be it.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: If you read what the Deputy Speaker said, Mr. Speaker, you will find that she did not reply to the point of order which was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). She said:

"Order. If I am to be heard, I ask hon. Members to listen."

—[Official Report, 8 November 1988; Vol. 140. c. 262.]

I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that the point of order has not been responded to by the Chair. I believe that we have a right to a full and considered response from you, Mr. Speaker. If that cannot be done today, perhaps you will be able to respond tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the Deputy Speaker put the Question again and collected the voices. That is what Hansard clearly shows. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Well, it does not show that she collected the voices again. Ten-minute Bill. Mr. Harry Cohen.

Mr. Dobson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The rules of the House are fairly clear, and they are intended to protect hon. Members on both sides of the House. You, Mr. Speaker, and the other occupants of the Chair do your level best to ensure that they provide that protection. Yesterday, it was clear that there was discontent about the nature of private Member's Bills and the way in which they pass through the House with Government support. There was high feeling on both sides of the House.

Whatever there was in terms of feeling, however, there were no voices to be heard at the appropriate time. I have no wish to criticise Madam Deputy Speaker, but we think that she got it wrong. If the matter is left as it stands, it will set a precedent for it will mean that the voices no longer matter. In future, there may be some instances where the Opposition would welcome the fact that voices did not matter, but the Government might not like that. We would like a ruling from you, Mr. Speaker, on whether the voices will continue to matter.

Mr. Speaker: Certainly the voices matter. My ruling is a simple one and the House has heard it. I have no power or authority to overrule the decision of the occupant of the Chair at the time.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: There is no ruling.

Mr. Speaker: I have no power to reverse what happened yesterday.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Speaker: The voices were collected and the Division took place. Mr. Harry Cohen—ten-minute Bill.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockport, North): On a new point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Oh, God! Yes. What is it?

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): No, Mr. Speaker—Frank Cook actually.

Mr. Speaker: It was intended to be a compliment.

Mr. Cook: I apologise, Mr. Speaker, for not responding immediately when you agreed to hear my point of order. I was struck dumb by my sudden promotion.

I seek your guidance, Mr. Speaker. You will know, Mr. Speaker, that I am a recent appointee to the Select Committee on Procedure. If I cannot understand what is happening, Mr. Speaker, there may be other members of the Select Committee who find that they are in similar difficulties. Perhaps I should recount my experience of sitting on the far end of the Opposition Front Bench as a Whip. When I did not say No loud enough when voices were being collected, Mr. Deputy Speaker said that the call was not loud enough, that that was hard luck and that we had lost the Division. The collection of voices is important. That has been the position in the past and it continues to be the position.

The issue is, when are procedures total and finite and when are they to be ignored? We have already heard, Mr. Speaker, that there was no ruling and that the House merely went on with the Division. If we do not have a ruling and if no guidance is given, I shall be lost. I shall be unable to fulfil my functions and carry out my responsibilities as a member of the Select Committee on Procedure.

Mr. Speaker: I think that we should get on with today's business—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] If the House feels strongly about the matter, hon. Members should ask the Select Committee on Procedure to give Mr. Speaker authority to overrule other occupants of the Chair——

Mr. Campbell-Savours: There was no ruling.

Mr. Speaker: —who took a particular decision. At present, I have no authority to do that.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: There was no ruling.

Mr. Speaker: The House cannot possibly ask Mr. Speaker to do something for which he has no authority and which he cannot do.

Mr. Dobson: I think that my right hon. and hon. Friends would be grateful, Mr. Speaker, if you, with Madam Deputy Speaker and the Clerk, were to review what happened last night, and then to give a ruling for the future. We are not necessarily asking you to overrule what happened last night. We are asking you to take the course that I have suggested, in your role as the protector of everyone's rights in this place. We ask you to give a ruling on the application or otherwise of the Standing Orders that apply to voices, which clearly were not complied with last night. I think that everyone would agree that they should be authoritative.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman raised a point of order at the time. He should have persisted with the matter last night.

Mr. Dobson: I have no wish to embarrass you, Mr. Speaker, as the occupant of the Chair. You seek to persuade us to make brief points of order, not to pursue them and not to continue to take up the time of the House. I thought last night—it is clear that my colleagues took the same view—that once we had had the opportunity of listening to the tape, we might get some response from you, Mr. Speaker. It was clearly unreasonable to ask Madam Deputy Speaker to leave the Chair to listen to the tape to ascertain what had gone on.

I find it a trifle upsetting to be told now that having raised a point of order at the moment that the issue arose, that point of order does not count. It seems that I am being told that I should have persisted with it. I do not know what I should have said to Madam Deputy Speaker when she said:

"A Division is now in progress."—[Official Report, 8 November 1988; Vol. 140, c. 262.]

Should I have tried to interrupt the Division? We are asking you, Mr. Speaker, to review what happened last night, not necessarily to overrule it. We wish you to clarify exactly where we stand in relation to the Standing Orders.

Mr. Speaker: We really should get on. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] The authoritative record is Hansard, not the tape. What matters is what the occupant of the Chair hears and what is recorded in Hansard. In fairness, it must not ask the Speaker to overrule the occupant of the Chair when he has no authority so to do.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: There is no ruling.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance on this important matter. Is not the normal procedure that which happened yesterday—that the Second Deputy Chairman said,

"I think that the Noes have it."—[Official Report, 8 November 1988; Vol. 140, c. 262.]

She did not say, "The Noes have it. The Noes have it", as often happens, which is usually an invitation to the other side who wish to oppose to shout. Is it not correct that Madam Deputy Speaker then heard the point of order made by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) and made a ruling by continuing the Division, which was the end of the matter?

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The House is not asking you to overrule Madam Deputy Speaker but to look at the matter. Fresh evidence has been raised and there is no reason why, without any commitment, you could not discuss the matter with the people concerned and come back to the House. I put that as a sensible suggestion to you.

Mr. Speaker: In order to conclude this matter, I will discuss what happened last night with the Deputy Speaker. She has already mentioned it to me this morning, but I shall discuss it with her further. I think that we should now get on.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No, I cannot say more than I have said. Is the point of order on a different matter?

Mr. Meale: It is in relation to your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I have not made any ruling.

Parental Leave

5.1 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to introduce a statutory right to a period of parental leave for working parents of young children; to make provision for the establishment of a parental leave fund for the reimbursement of payment made during parental leave; and for connected purposes.

I shall certainly be shouting aye loudly when I have presented the Bill.

I am pleased to reintroduce my Parental Leave Bill which was first introduced on 11 February last year, when it had considerable support in the nation. It is a radical and progressive measure for parents and children. It provides that mothers and fathers be allowed to take three months' paid leave during the first two years of their child's life. It can be in the first five years if the child is disabled or adopted. Parental leave will also apply to single parents and, on a pro rata basis, to part-time workers. It gives the parents the right to return to the same or similar work after an absence for child care.

The benefits of parental leave are enormous. It promotes equal opportunities, especially for women, and it gives a mother more options, knowing that the time off will be available to herself and her husband. It makes it easier for her to choose whether to return to work after the birth of her baby. With the provision of parental leave, her employment conditions take into account her real life circumstances—those of a mother. At present, many women are simply denied the choice of whether to return to work. Many of those who do return are in low-paid, low-calibre jobs, increasingly part-time, and their skills are neither properly used nor rewarded.

Parental leave also helps women to overcome the discontinuity in employment caused by child rearing. Britain has a low employment rate for women compared with the United States and other industrialised nations. A mother of two is out of the labour force for over seven years on average and loses earnings of more than £140,000 during her working life. That is unfair, but it could be overcome with measures such as my Parental Leave Bill.

Parental leave also distributes responsibility for child care more fairly between the parents, recognising it as a joint responsibility, not the woman's alone. Parental leave actively promotes that important change in attitude.

Parental leave also improves family and child welfare. It allows and encourages mother and father to work together as a team, sharing the burdens and the pleasures of caring for their baby. It recognises the importance of bonding, especially between father and child. Mr. T. Berry Brazelton, the chief medical officer of Harvard medical school in Boston, writing in American Journal of Orthopsychiatry, said:

> "We have seen that relatively minor, relatively inexpensive adjustments on the part of the medical system—such as . . . father participation . . . —can increase the opportunities for 'bonding' to the baby. Although this is likely to be only a first step toward fostering attachment and significantly enhancing the possibilities for the baby's optimal development, it is a most important step."

I could give many other examples from the experts.

Parental leave will also counter the growing incidence of child abuse in Britain and be a serious measure in the reduction of family stress, which can be so damaging.

Parental leave gives dads a fairer deal. Fathers are almost forgotten contributors to child development, but most want to contribute positively. Many, when given the opportunity, find that they enjoy spending time with their children.

The benefits are enormous and they are widely recognised abroad. For example, 10 of the 12 EC countries already have parental leave arrangements. That is recognised by the Under-Secretary of State for Employment, the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) in his letter to me dated 10 June. Britain is dragging its feet in denying working parents parental leave. The Government say that the EC countries have widely differing provisions, but at least they have them. Britain should have them as well. The Government should not continue to veto the EC draft directive.

The cost of parental leave has been referred to as a problem. The EC scheme would at most cost only £45 million. Mine would cost more, mainly because it is better, but it would cost less than 0·1 per cent. of overall working costs. My Bill recognises the impact that parental leave would have on small businesses by setting up a parental leave fund so that such people would not lose out.

It is easier for the employer and employee to plan, and would cost less, if leave were authorised rather than being unauthorised, as happens now. The skills returned to those firms by women's return to work is also of considerable value and should be taken into account. The benefits of parental leave clearly outweigh its cost. That is why the rest of Europe has adopted some form of parental leave.

My Bill has received widespread support. Significantly, active support has come from the British Medical Association, which says that it will give British parents the same opportunities as the majority of their counterparts in Europe, laying the foundations for a secure family life. The BMA goes into greater detail, which I shall not deal with because of the shortage of time, but it also presses parental leave upon the National Health Service, where it says it is very much needed, and the matter is being taken up at Whitley council level. In recognition of that, and in their role as employer, the Government should move towards parental leave.

My Bill is also supported by the Equal Opportunities Commission. It believes that there is an urgent need for such an arrangement to assist the reconciliation of work and family responsibilities and to encourage a more equitable sharing of the latter. It is also supported by the National Childbirth Trust. [Interruption.] Hon. Members groan every time I mention such organisations.

The Maternity Alliance supports my proposals and states that there needs to be a statutory right to parental leave as that would be the single most important step to reducing the disadvantages suffered by working parents, although it would like to see other improvements in child care provision as well. The Maternity Alliance itself has the support of more than 50 national organisations, some of which are very well known.

My Bill has the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson), so it is agreed Labour party policy that a system of parental leave should be introduced. It has the support of many trade unions. NUPE has sent me a letter giving the Bill its strong support and urging the Government to think again about the draft directive and their veto of it. Many local authorities have also written to me to that effect.

The denial of parental leave is part of the Government's reduction in overall child care support which includes the freezing of child benefit last week. There have been any number of reductions. Last week, The Observer commented:

"Mothers bringing up Britain's next generation are made to feel like scroungers."

That is because of the effect that cuts have on child care. My Bill seeks to rectify that. My purpose in introducing it now is to influence the Queen's Speech and to make the Government think again; to start acting in favour of children and the family rather than utter platitudes while at the same time marching in the opposite direction and cutting child benefit.

The European Commission report, "Child Care and Equality of Opportunity" stated that the principal aim "is a Europe where the work and responsibility involved in child care is properly valued and more equally distributed; where parents can reconcile family responsibilities and employment . . . in a way that is satisfying and does not involve disadvantage and inequality; and where children can get the advantage of a range of positive and enhancing experiences at home, in child care services and society at large. These aims concern both equality and quality of life."

My Bill is part of that aim.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Harry Cohen, Ms. Jo Richardson, Mrs. Margaret Beckett, Mrs. Ann Clwyd, Ms. Clare Short, Mrs. Audrey Wise, Mr. Tony Banks, Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, Mr. Don Dixon, Mr. Dave Nellist, Mr. Tony Benn and Mr. Bob Clay.

Parental Leave

Mr. Harry Cohen accordingly presented a Bill to introduce a statutory right to a period of parental leave for working parents of young children; to make provision for the establishment of a parental leave fund for the reimbursement of payment made during parental leave; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 230.]

Orders of the Day

Housing Bill

Lords amendments considered.

5.12 pm

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have for a number of months expressed our concern about the way in which the Bill has been handled both in the House and outside. I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker—although I recognise that there is little you can do—the fact that last Wednesday during Environment Question Time there were two opportunities for the Government to tell the House of Commons first what they intended doing about housing action trusts and their vote.

In fact, the Government announced their intentions to the nation on a television programme last Sunday. As one of my hon. Friends described it, it was Government by Dimbleby. We object to Government announcements being made on television when only a few days previously they missed an opportunity of dealing with the matter during questions, which only serves to devalue Question Time.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Not only was the Government's announcement on television extremely vague, but when my office phoned the appropriate Government Department a little later, it did not know whether or not an announcement had been made. We often complain to you, Mr. Speaker, knowing that all you can do is to listen, and that you are a means of passing on our complaints. I realise that you cannot do anything, but I wish to register a very strong protest.

My other point concerns a matter that we have been raising for a year. We have had the shortest possible time, rather than the normal amount of time, to deal with matters that have come to this House from another place. I realise that we are near to the end of this Session, but corners are being cut far too often, particularly in respect of major legislation affecting millions of people, and that is not acceptable.

Mr. George Howarth (Knowsley, North): Further to those points of order, Mr. Speaker. The House has problems enough arising from the Minister for Environment, Countryside and Water being in another place and not accountable to this House. That is compounded by the fact that major announcements are made on television rather than from the Floor of this House. There is a strong feeling on the Opposition Benches that it borders on contempt when announcements are made in that way.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that the broadcast in question concerned housing action trusts. I did not see it myself, but right hon. and hon. Members know my view that the House should always be the first to be told about such matter, rather than learn through other means. It will be possible to debate this matter under Lords amendment No. 111. Perhaps that will be the moment when right hon. and hon. Members who heard the broadcast can comment and ask questions.

ASSURED TENANCIES.

Lords amendment: No. 1, in page 1, line 17, after "(2)" insert "or subsection (5)"

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. David Trippier): I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 4, 45, 46, 166 and 250.

Mr. Trippier: Amendments Nos. 1 and 4 are designed to help local authorities arrange temporary accommodation for homeless people to whom they owe a duty under the homelessness provisions of the Housing Act 1985. Under that Act, local authorities have a duty to house the homeless temporarily in certain circumstances. Where an authority provides the temporary accommodation itself, it will normally have no difficulty obtaining possession when the time comes for the occupant to leave, because the Act provides tht lettings of that temporary kind are not secure tenancies for the first 12 months.

There can be problems where the temporary accommodation is provided by arrangement with another landlord, such as a housing association. The landlord needs to be sure that he can get possession when necessary to house other families. The amendments, which are modelled on the equivalent provision in the 1985 Act, thus provide that a tenancy granted by arrangement with a local authority pursuant to its duties to arrange temporary housing will not normally be assured during an initial 12 month period. Amendment No. 250 adds a similar provision to the equivalent Scottish legislation.

Amendments Nos. 2, 166, 3, 45 and 46 are concerned with tenancies where the landlord is a fully mutual housing association—usually referred to as a housing co-operative. The Bill provides that such tenancies cannot be assured tenancies. We included this on the argument that a statutory regime designed to regulate the relationship between landlord and tenant has little relevance in a situation where, as is the nature of a co-operative, the interests of landlord and tenants as a whole are, in effect, indivisible.

It has none the less emerged that a small number of co-operatives are at present letting on the basis of old-style assured tenancies under the Housing Act 1980. We accepted that it would be wrong, as a matter of principle, to deprive the tenants in those cases of statutory protection that they now have. Amendments Nos. 2, 3 and 45 deal with the problem by providing that an old-style assured tenancy under which the landlord is a fully mutual housing association will become, on commencement of the Act, a new-style assured tenancy.

Mr. Soley: This important amendment deals with assured tenancies. I should be grateful if the Minister will clarify certain points. He mentioned that, in certain circumstances, temporary accommodation may be provided by housing associations. However, amendment No. 45 implies that it will not necessarily be a housing association that is involved. In other words, the amendments could apply to any new landlord, and that is likely to be the case.

Lords amendment No. 4 is the meat of this group of amendments. Current legislation will result in many local authorities having no housing to offer the homeless, while still having a statutory duty to house them. It is feared that the Government are seeking to get rid of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977, or at least to redefine it so that it means ruthlessness. They will then be able to fiddle the figures much as they have done with the unemployment statistics, rather than solving the problem of homelessness, which is much more important than fiddling figures.

Under existing legislation, some local authorities are already trying to transfer all their housing stock to housing associations or other organisations. The Minister recently sent out guidance to local authorities, which appalled me when I read it, and which incidentally was never raised in the Standing Committee. One of the reasons why we complain about the management of the Bill at every available opportunity is that we did not debate many of these issues in Committee, because the Government had not given us the necessary information, or else made changes after the relevant stage was over.

The guidance stated that local authorities transferring all their stock might wish to enter a private contract with another landlord for the housing of homeless people. That raises a number of questions. For one thing it means privatising the homeless, but other matters never debated in Committee also become relevant here.

Let us suppose that, after a local authority has transferred all its stock, someone appears at the local council office claiming homelessness, perhaps accompanied by a couple of young children. The local authority enters into a contract with a private landlord who says that he will take the family, but we do not know how long he will have to take them for; it may be a long time or quite a short time. The problem will be complicated in some areas where the only alternative is for the homeless people to stay with that landlord, but if he keeps them for longer than 12 months their tenancy position will change.

The Minister puts the measure forward as a way of dealing with the problem of someone who becomes homeless but should not be made an assured tenant because the landlord will want to move him on in due course. In those circumstances, what will happen to the homeless family? Will they go back to the local authority and say that they have become homeless again because of the wording of the Bill?

The Government have made it clear many times that they intend to get local authorities to give up all their council housing. Even if we agree with that, which I do not, it is nonsense to get authorities to give up housing without being able to replace it. I do not think that anyone apart from the Government believes that the private sector will replace it. We know that that sector has lost even more rented accommodation since 1980 than suggested by some of my original estimates. Well over 550,000 lets have gone in the past few years. We also know that well over half the lets in London are outside the Rent Acts, so they would not seem to have much to do with it.

A number of further problems arise from the local authority's contract with the private landlord. First, we have no indication of what he can or should charge. If he is a monopoly supplier he may be able to charge the earth, and presumably the ratepayer will have to pick up the bill. The local authority, however, may be able to choose between two or three landlords. If, as the Minister has said, the landlord will want the homeless person out, perhaps the Government propose that, before the 12 months are up, the local authority should ring up yet another landlord and say, "In a few months Mr. Brown, who has kindly been housing a homeless family, will not house them any more, because if he does he will have to take them for good—or at least under the conditions of an assured tenancy. If we are to avoid that, we need someone else to take them."

Presumably Mr. Smith, who has been approached to take the family from Mr. Brown, will say, "I don't know. Are you going to leave them with me for as long as you left them with Mr. Brown?" The family will be, at best, passed around from one landlord to another, each landlord having to foreclose within 12 months. Alternatively, the local authority will have to try to wriggle out of its responsibilities.

The Observer of the Sunday before last featured an article about a Department of the Environment report which said that some local authorities took their responsibilities to the homeless much more seriously than others. The article claimed that the Government were deliberately suppressing the report because it said that, although councils were dealing with the homeless very well, some—Westminster was cited as an example, which came as no great surprise—were finding reasons for not housing them. Others, such as Birmingham, tried to rehouse them within a day. Birmingham is of course a Labour council. That says something about the different values on the two sides of the House.

A report produced by the Department, not by me or my supporters, states that some authorities are now backsliding on their responsibilities to the homeless. The amendment will mean either that landlord and local authority will vie with each other to move the family on or that, if the authority is desperate or devious enough, that it may try to persuade the landlord to keep the family for longer than a year to obtain the greater assurance for which the amendment provides. The argument thus becomes extremely complex.

As so often in the Bill, the Government have said that this is only a small change and that the Lords have made an improvement. I shall not argue about the nature of the improvement, but, as always, the handling of the change has meant no debate in Committee or on Report, and the proposal has not been examined in depth. Now, for understandable and good reasons, the Lords have introduced a measure that will mean many homeless people either being shunted between landlords or pushed out into the street again. Alternatively, the council will try to back them by persuading a private landlord to keep them for a long time.

I think that the Bill is a disaster. I make no bones about that. Last year homelessness doubled in this country, and I have no doubt that it will double again, not least because of the Chancellor's absurd interest rates policy. He claims as an example of its working for the economy that it makes it harder to get mortgages—in other words, harder to buy. Given that it is already harder to rent, we must ask where on earth people on low incomes are supposed to rent or buy. The answer that the Government always give is that somehow or other, the private sector will resurrect itself and make up the difference and homeless people will be able to turn to the private sector. But there is no sign that that is happening.

We are being asked to accept Lords amendments to deal with that, so we need to know how local authorities are supposed to deal with homeless persons in the circumstances that I have described. No one denies that there will be an increase in homelessness. The other day I was interested to hear either the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State say that one of the problems of homelessness was young women getting pregnant in order to jump the queue. I find that suggestion offensive and insulting. The number of women in a decade in Britain who decide to get pregnant in order to jump the housing queue probably could be counted on one hand. The hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) may shake his head, but it is incredibly insulting to suggest that women get pregnant for that reason.

5.30 pm

Conservative Members forget that there is a duty on local authorities to tell people who is entitled to be housed. In certain circumstances, they have a duty to house women who are going to have babies. However, that does not mean that women rush out and get pregnant in order to jump the list. Even if that were the case, it is clear from the statistics that the fastest-growing reason for homelessness is mortgage repossession. One in 10 homeless families are homeless because they cannot pay their mortgage. One in 10 of homeless families are homeless because of mortgage foreclosure, compared with about one in 25 under the last Labour Government. That is the nature and extent of the problem.

Under the Bill and the existing legislation, local authorities are already moving all their tenants into the private sector. They are asking housing associations to take them over, they are setting up housing associations or, in some cases, they are looking for private landlords, who are not part of the public sector as are housing associations—at least in part. The Government have not told the councils or the people of this country—some of whom will become homeless—what will happen when people present themselves as homeless at the town hall, the town hall parcels them out to one of the contracted private landlords, and the private landlord says, "The Bill as amended says that if I keep you for too long, you become an assured tenant. I cannot risk that, so you will have to go."

Am I correct in my interpretation that the amendment relates to all landlords, and not just to housing associations? Secondly, will the Minister spell out in detail his views on how local authorities are supposed to deal with homelessness when the homeless have been contracted out to private landlords who are worried about keeping them for too long in case they become assured tenants?

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): I am glad that at last the word "homeless" appears in the Bill. It has only just appeared in an amendment at this very late stage. Certainly, some hon. Members, at least those on the Opposition Benches, believe that the Bill will generate homelessness, but I am glad to see that at least the word appears in the Bill.

I am grateful to the Minister for a reply that I received to a question I tabled earlier this month.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. Is he aware of a parliamentary reply I received from the Department of the Environment? I asked what study had been made of prospective tenants on housing waiting lists and of whether people waiting for accommodation from local authorities could pay the market rents. I received a reply from the Minister saying that no such study had been carried out. Does my hon. Friend agree that the large majority of people on housing waiting lists would be in no position to pay market rents?

Mr. Battle: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention, as questions quite often receive deceptive replies. I would couple the question to which my hon. Friend has referred with a question that he asked earlier to which he received a reply from the Government suggesting that there should be no more council house building in Britain.

Earlier this month I asked the Minister

"What advice he proposes to give to local authorities which have no housing stock about their fulfilment of their statutory duty to house the homeless."

I remind the Minister of his reply. He referred to the guidelines that his Department issued in June and said:

"This makes it clear that local authorities must make adequate arrangements to continue to meet their statutory obligations in relation to housing the homeless under part III of the Housing Act 1985. In deciding whether to give consent to large-scale disposal, the Secretary of State will need to be satisfied that such arrangements have been made."—[Official Report, 2 November 1988; Vol. 139, c. 689.]

That is a circular answer which builds a circular argument for the Government. It is not a question of large-scale disposals which may leave behind some council housing. What will happen when all the council housing has gone? How on earth will a council be able to fulfil its obligations to house the homeless, unless, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) suggested—he asked the Government to clarify this—the interpretation behind the amendment is that the Government intend local authorities to make arrangements with private landlords? Is that the case, or are the Government suggesting that in future local authorities make arrangements with housing action trusts and give them the statutory obligations to house the homeless? That is not in the Bill.

If that is the case, it is clear that a hidden agenda lies behind the amendment, and the Government are beginning to offload the duties of local authorities to house the homeless on to private landlords and housing associations. That would change the offer to homeless people from that of a secure tenancy to a temporary provision and downgrade their status in society.

Will the Minister make it absolutely plain to the House tonight that the Government do not intend to downgrade the status of the homeless and to shift the bed-and-breakfast option into statutory provision? That could be a consequence of the measure. If councils have no housing for homeless people, where can they go except into bed-and-breakfast accommodation? Ministers have condemned bed and breakfast as a bad deal costing the taxpayers excessive amounts in housing benefit. Will the Minister now say that that is not the option that will be left? If a local authority is to be told that it can fulfil its statutory obligations only by supporting bed-and-breakfast accommodation, the Bill ends where it started and does not tackle the real problems of housing in our society. I hope that tonight the Minister will give us some assurance that that is not the hidden agenda behind the amendment.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I have only one question to put to the Under-Secretary of State, and I welcome him to the debate. It is particularly unsatisfactory that, for the first time for many years, we have no Minister for Housing who is a Member of the House. I know that the Secretary of State heads the Department, and it is proper that he is on the Government Front Bench. However, it is entirely unacceptable that the person entrusted by the Government with the responsibility for housing has no constituents whatsoever. He has no constituents who tell him about the plight of the homeless, who come to him homeless or who tell him about the effects of the cuts in housing benefit, about their difficulties in obtaining a move or about their conditions.

I have not checked, and I have no idea how large an estate or how large a home or homes the Earl of Caithness has—[Interruption.] It is entirely relevant, because people who live in mansions on large estates have no idea what it is like to live in damp tower blocks or inner-city slums. I know what it is like because I live in the middle of my constituency, which is one of the worst and most deprived housing areas in Britain.

I understand that the arrangements are temporary and that the Minister for Housing may be packed off elsewhere after he has done his job of getting the remaining amendments through the House of Lords. If we are to have housing legislation in the next Session, I sincerely hope that the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister will do the House and the country the courtesy of appointing a Minister for Housing who is accountable to the House of Commons and who has some idea of what the housing crisis in Britain in 1988 is like.

Mr. John Heddle (Mid-Staffordshire): Would the hon. Gentleman acknowledge that the noble Lord, the Minister for Housing, Environment and Countryside is a fellow of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors, which may enable him to bring some practical knowledge of housing Acts, landlords and tenants and housing generally to bear on his job? Does not that make him as well qualified for the job as a member of the Bar?

Mr. Hughes: I accept the hon. Gentleman's valid factual point about the Minister's qualifications, but it is entirely unacceptable that the man in charge of British housing has no constituents and is elected by no one. Recent housing legislation has been the result of the Government's failure to understand. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman saw the programme "On the Record" on Sunday——

Mr. Heddle: The hon. Gentleman obviously did not.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, I did; I did not see the beginning, but I watched the whole interview with the noble Lord. The U-turn, or concession, made on housing action trust votes —we shall debate that later—came only because at some time in the summer the Secretary of State, his junior Minister and others went to meet real people to talk about real issues, thereby coming to understand the folly of the Government's proposals.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): As the hon. Gentleman says, that ministerial statement was made on television, not here. Does not that emphasise the hon. Gentleman's point that the Government treat Parliament with contempt, appointing unelected Ministers with responsibilities for major programmes of activity? These Ministers do not even announce major initiatives in the other place—they do so on television.

Mr. Hughes: That is correct. The programme I have referred to was one of those extraordinary times when it was impossible to know whether an announcement had been made. Certainly, that was not clear to the interviewer or to the waiting public: was it a concession or an acceptance of the Lords amendment? That was not clarified until later, as I said in a point of order to Mr. Speaker.

In future, I hope for clear announcements, made in the proper way, in the right place—this Chamber.

I want to ask the Under-Secretary of State a question about Lords amendment No. 1. Amendments Nos. 1 and 4—especially No. 4—provide for two options. Present arrangements for housing the homeless, as laid down in the Housing Act 1985, are usually for assured tenancies for the first 12 months. Exceptionally, if people want to resile from that, they can create an assured tenancy in less than 12 months. What does the Minister regard as the appropriate policy for granting accommodation to the homeless? On Friday we are to debate these matters on a Government motion for the Adjournment. It would be helpful to know now whether the Government think that people who qualify for accommodation temporarily, indefinitely or permanently, because they are homeless, should be given only insecure accommodation—or the same security as anyone else.

5.45 pm

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I have a simple question for the Minister, to which I want a full and honest response. How will local authorities deal with the homeless? Is the privatisation of homelessness to be forced on us, as happened with the care of the elderly by means of a series of measures? Now, there is wholesale private care of the elderly, whereas before local authorities had the resources to deal with them.

If homelessness is to be privatised, the Minister must give us some guarantees, the more so as this is one of the few occasions in the course of proceedings on the Bill when we can discuss this subject. Friday is fine, but it is good to have a Minister here now to answer questions about the detail of the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) mentioned bed and breakfast. Is that to be housing's equivalent of private residential homes for the elderly? Parallels between the two can be drawn. These moves cannot be justified even in the Government's own economic terms. They will be wasteful and destructive of family life—so much has already been proved. I have come across this as a local councillor. Sadly, during the past two or three years Halifax has developed a real homelessness problem. In the past it had a proud record of housing people; now we have full hostels, and we have to use bed-and-breakfast and private accommodation, which is often squalid. Local authorities are left with no alternative but to use it.

The Government are using this Bill deliberately to destroy the welfare state. As an example of that, I offer a unique scheme in Halifax to rehouse young people, many of whom had offended or been in care. It was sabotaged even before it started because cuts in housing benefit made it uneconomic. My constituency contains a high-rise block of flats that could have been put to good use. In conjunction with Stoneham housing association, the council was to furnish the flats and let them cheaply to homeless people, but, because of changes in the law this April, housing benefits are no longer available, which has left many of these youngsters £4·65 short each week.

All these factors have combined to create a horrendous homelessness problem. Does the Minister intend to seek the wholesale privatisation of the homeless? He owes the House an honest answer.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): Almost in the final hour of debate on this Bill, the Government have introduced the word "homelessness", thereby affording some recognition—albeit insignificant—to a growing problem.

Over the past decade, the Government have presided over a doubling of homelessness in Britain, and that is only the tip of the iceberg. Those figures are calculated by the Government and local authorities and do not include people who are homeless but do not qualify as such under the Act. Another reason why the Government are trying to give the impression that they are concerned about homelessness is that it was becoming clear throughout the summer in leaks from the Department that the Government intended to consider changing the whole nature of homelessness legislation in the Queen's Speech and to replace it with the concept of rooflessness. At that point the Government came under ever more powerful pressure because of their callous attitude to homelessness.

Since July, five reports on the problem have been issued. The Audit Commission's final report has not yet been completed but the draft report is a damning indictment of the way in which the Secretary of State has handled and defined homelessness. The Commission said that the major reason for homelessness was the Government's market philosophy of housing, as shown in the Bill. It is also true that the Government, in trying to avoid the embarrassment of the report, have rushed out their own document about rural housing. That is a matter that we shall return to on other amendments.

What has been said by the Institute of Housing and the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy? Those organisations completed major reports about housing this summer. On 9 November, a report was published in Housing magazine about homelessness. The report was prepared not by politicians but by professionals and it involved consultations with housing associations, local authorities, community groups and housing charities. The report comes to the conclusion that the Government's underinvestment in public housing is a major factor in the increase in homelessness in the United Kingdom. The report says:

> "Some means, such as 'homeless at home' schemes, exist to help reduce the use of bed and breakfast. We were also convinced that housing associations must play a more active role and offer greater assistance to local authorities in housing the homeless. Nevertheless . . . Government must accept responsibilities for meeting the needs of homeless people, instead of expecting local authorities with their limited administering resources, to bear the brunt. Direct action must be taken to ensure that the 50,000-70,000 extra homes a year . . . are actually built."

Those homes should be built in the public sector.

What is the Government's response to that call from the professional organisations involved in housing, the voluntary sector and charities? The Chancellor of the Exchequer gave a clue in his autumn statement. Inside Housing, Volume 5, No. 43 says:

"The bonanza caused by the rise in council house sales will not be reinvested in housing. That is the message contained in Chancellor Nigel Lawson's Autumn Statement published this week—and it's bleak news for local authorities and those in housing need . . . For 1989/90 local authorities have been given a negative cash limit: the total they will be allowed to spend (£3,303 million) will be less than the amount coming in from capital receipts (£3,490 m). Actual allocations through the housing investment programme will be cut 20 per cent. in cash—and nearly 26 per cent. in real terms—compared to this year, leaving a HIP total of only £920 m."

That is the Government's response to the debate over the summer about the growing crisis of homelessness and that is why the Minister spoke so inadequately for the Lords amendments. None of the amendments will tackle the growing crisis of homelessness in Britain. The Government are creating not only an under-class, but a class of nomads who go from one hostel to another and from one bed-and-breakfast hotel to another. There is no opportunity for the single homeless or for homeless families to set down roots or to be involved in the community. The Government do not give a damn about that, because the homeless are also voteless. The crisis of homelessness denies people the opportunity to put down roots and the opportunity to have a say in the running of the country. The Government's policy of underinvestment shows a great disregard for many people in the United Kingdom. The Minister owes it us to bring forward genuine proposals this evening to deal with the growing crisis of homelessness.

The Minister need only walk with me five minutes from the House to see men and women sleeping tonight in cardboard boxes. That is London 1988, not 1888. Tonight, 7,000 young people will sleep rough in the nation's capital. They are not feckless people who are unable to seek jobs. They were persuaded by the Government and by the former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to get on their bike to seek their fortunes in the capital city. They find themselves not only isolated and jobless, but without a roof over their heads. That happens not only tonight, but every night of the year—in summer, winter, or spring.

The Secretary of State does not seem to be able even to listen—or perhaps he does not like to hear about what happens to the homeless. He is responsible for the housing problem not only because of his intellectual contempt for the homeless, but because in a former life he was a private landlord. I can imagine his attitude to the homeless.

Mr. Simon Hughes: I am sure that the hon. Member realises that if one goes over the river to Waterloo, one will see many homeless men and women sleeping out every night. Many do not take one penny off the state and never have done. Some of them still manage to go to work and earn money, although they can find nowhere to live and have no prospect of doing so for months on end. There are queues for the more sheltered spaces under the arches, let alone at housing offices up and down the country.

Mr. McCartney: The hon. Member is right. I shall make an offer to the Secretary of State. Will he come with me to the jobcentre in Victoria street and meet the young and middle-aged, men and women who are waiting for an odd job in hotels or, ironically, bed-and-breakfast accommodation? They work during the day and sleep rough at night, yet they go back day after day to seek a living. The hon. Gentleman was right to say that they do not receive a single penny of benefit from the community. They do not receive housing benefit, unemployment benefit or income support.

The crisis is not merely a crisis of rooflessness, as the Government put it; it is a crisis of the nation's social conscience. The Minister must take steps to meet that social crisis. Housing is an essential part of the issue, so he must come up not only with simple little phrases about dealing with homelessness, but with cash and resources to provide new housing to meet the crisis. He must do so before young people's lives are ruined. They run the risk not only of bad health caused by living rough, but of being morally corrupted. The Minister has refused to deal with the moral corruption of young men and women who are forced into immoral practices because they are unable to find jobs or houses, and the support of families and the community is denied to them.

Will the Minister give a commitment to visit cardboard city and to meet the people who seek jobs at the jobcentre in Victoria street and then sleep on Charing Cross embankment? He should see for himself the results of the bankruptcy of Conservative policies on homelessness in this country.

Mr. Winnick: Labour Members make no apology for being passionately concerned about the plight of the homeless, as was my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney). I know that the Secretary of State has his good points on other matters——

Mrs. Mahon: Which ones?

Mr. Winnick: His good points are not in political matters. The Secretary of State simply does not care about housing. Some senior Ministers have a private concern about housing, which they do not often express. However, the Secretary of State has no public or private concern about the misery of the homeless. He does not understand the problem, he could not care less about it and he probably thinks that people could find accommodation if they really wanted to.

We are debating an amendment that has a great bearing on the position of the homeless. Homelessness could be avoided if local authorities were able to build accommodation. I have been given figures that show that the number of new public sector starts for the coming financial year will be well below 20,000 for the whole country. That means that in some places, such as my borough, no local authority building has taken place for nine years. Unless the Government change their policy on local authority finance, there is not the slightest chance of any new building taking place. Ministers respond by asking, "What about the empty dwellings?" A number of dwellings are undoubtedly empty because work is being undertaken, but all the empty dwellings put together would be a drop in the ocean when compared to the need to house and rehouse people in the public sector.

When I intervened in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) I referred to a ministerial reply that I had received. My question was a simple one. I asked whether the Department of the Environment had undertaken a survey to find out how many people on the local authority housing waiting list were in a position to pay market rents. The whole emphasis of the Bill as regards the private sector is that all new tenancies will be subject to market rents, and it is therefore relevant to ask how many of those waiting for accommodation could pay market rents. I received the clear and simple reply that no such survey had been undertaken. That must be a matter of concern.

I do not suggest that everyone on the waiting list is desperately in need of accommodation, but the people who come to my surgery and who write to me daily about their housing problems are in a miserable plight. A young couple came to my surgery last weekend. They do not have children and they live with the wife's mother, who has other adult children living in the household. When I explained to them that the Government believed that they should be able to solve their problem by getting a mortgage and buying a place, they laughed, because they simply do not have the means to obtain a mortgage.

My hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield spoke of homelessness in this part of London. That is partly the Government's responsibility, but much of the responsibility also undoubtedly rests with the leadership of Westminster council. The way in which that council is being run is absolutely scandalous. Westminster council is in the process of selling off as much of its accommodation as possible—with or without tenants. It is trying to privatise the homelessness problem and will not take responsibility for the homeless.

It gives me no satisfaction to say that Lady Porter, the leader of Westminster council, is quite simply unfit to run a local authority. If the leadership had any understanding at all, it would be doing its utmost to fulfil its statutory responsibility for housing and would be putting pressure on the Government to allow it the finance necessary to house the homeless. Lady Porter, who almost acts as a dictator of the council rather than a normal leader of a local authority, does not seem to have any time for her Conservative colleagues, who are supposed to—[HON. MEMBERS: "They do not have much time for her, either."] Probably not. If ever a local authority needed to be investigated, it is the London borough of Westminster. Conservative Members may not be willing to echo my sentiments but I am sure that many of them—perhaps even those present now—privately accept that what I am saying is quite true. Lady Porter should not be in her present position and the sooner there is a change, the better it will be for all concerned.

Mr. Allan Roberts: I am sure that my hon. Friend is aware that a by-election is to take place in the Victoria ward of the borough of Westminster. The subject that we are discussing—the rights of housing association and private sector tenants—is becoming an issue in that by-election. That will enable Labour to move very much nearer to taking control of Westminster council.

Mr. Winnick: Leaving aside any patriotic party motive that I may have for wanting Labour to take control of Westminster, I am quite sure that it would be a godsend for all those who are now suffering in the borough, and who recognise that a change of control of the council would help to relieve their problem.

For what it is worth, the amendment provides limited protection, requiring a court order before eviction can take place. I repeat that the plight of the homeless should occupy all our thoughts. In previous debates I have spoken, like my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield, about the homeless people who will be sleeping on the Embankment tonight. They are living in conditions which are more likely to be associated with conditions in a Third world country than with Britain.

If hon. Members think that I am exaggerating, they should go and look for themselves. We shall probably be here for quite a time and it would do no harm for Conservative Members—I shall join them if they like—to take a walk to see how many of our fellow citizens will be spending a cold November night in cardboard boxes, not because they are drunk or lazy or irresponsible, but because they are in no position to organise their housing; they cannot afford housing in the capital. Some of those people—not all, by any means—have taken the advice of the Government and have come hundreds of miles to seek a job. Whether they can find a job or not, they are certainly not in a position to solve their own housing problems.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): The hon. Gentleman poses an interesting challenge. He compares the First and Third worlds and that is a legitimate comparison; there are 1 million people sleeping on the pavements of Calcutta. However, I challenge him to name any major capital city in the western developed world where a similiar problem does not exist, irrespective of the character or style of the Government in power.

Mr. Winnick: The obvious comparison is with New York—a city in the most advanced capitalist country. We know the sort of policies that are pursued in the United States and it is understandable that London and New York should have the same homelessness problem. [Interruption.]

Hon. Members: Stand up and say it.

Mr. Winnick: If the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) would stand up, I would gladly give way.

The hon. Member for Havant (Sir I. Lloyd) may say that in India many more people live in the conditions that I have described. But it is not part of our argument that conditions are the same here as in the Indian subcontinent. I am simply saying that the plight of those to whom my hon. Friends and I have referred—albeit a small minority —is disgraceful. It should not be allowed, and in most cases it is not the fault of the individual. It arises because in places such as London people cannot find a place through a local authority or housing association or obtain a mortgage.

Sir Ian Lloyd: I do not for one moment disagree with the hon. Gentleman's general comments about the undesirability—the tragedy—of homelessness, whether in Calcutta or in London. But the problem has defeated the organisation of man and systems generally. In every major capital city of the world, the problem of homelessness exists and has not been solved.

Mr. Winnick: I shall not be sarcastic in welcoming the hon. Gentleman into the debate. The hon. Gentleman and I have known each other for many years. We differ profoundly on many issues, but we have never been sarcastic to each other. The hon. Gentleman, with whom I completely disagree, has made his point in a courteous manner. I am very pleased that he has entered our debate, because hon. Members on both sides of the House should be talking about homelessness.

I think that the gist of the hon. Gentleman's argument was that the problem has defeated all Governments. But the problem of homelessness has become far more acute. The number of homeless people has trebled under the Conservative Government, and the explanation is relatively simple. Some problems are highly complex, but the reason why there are so many more homeless people —and near-homeless people who do not have to sleep in those conditions but who, like my constituents are childless and living with in-laws and may wait years to be offered local authority accommodation—is quite simple. It is because in 1979 the Government made it their deliberate policy to ensure that as few local authority dwellings as possible were built.

It should be clear to the hon. Member for Havant that reducing public sector building from 109,000 starts in the last full year of the Labour Government to a figure likely to be well under 20,000 this year means that people who cannot resolve their housing problems other than through local authority accommodation are bound to find themselves in the position that we have described.

Mr. Soley: It is important to deal with an excuse that is often used by Conservative Members. There has always been a problem of homelessness in all societies, usually focused on alcoholics, drug addicts, burnt-out schizophrenics, tramps and people who genuinely wish to be homeless. What is uniquely different about Britain and the United States today—I know of no other modern western country in a similar position—is that the problem of homelessness is increasing without being due to those causes. It is due to mortgage repossessions and so on. Britain and the United States seem unable to cope with the problem, so it is accelerating compared with countries such as those in Scandinavia where the problem has steadily decreased. That is a damning indictment of the British Government and, indeed, the United States Government.

Mr. Winnick: My hon. Friend makes the position quite clear. If the hon. Member for Havant, with whom I disagree but who always puts his points in a courteous manner, will look at the advertisements in the London Standard for rented accommodation—no doubt the situation is similar in his own area—he will find that the smallest flat is likely to cost more than £100 per week, a house between £300 and £400 per week and even a single room between £40 and £50 per week. That is the position in London, and much of the responsibility for it must rest with the Government.

I hope that the Minister will explain what action the Government intend to take to ensure that local authorities with the will to deal with homelessness, unlike the London borough of Westminster, are in a position to do so. Do the Government intend to shift the responsibility to people in the private sector who will not be able to provide accommodation for the homeless on a permanent basis? The Minister's answer that no survey had been undertaken to discover whether people on housing waiting lists could pay market rents shows that the Housing Bill is not concerned with the homeless or the near-homeless and will in no way resolve the problems of the people most in need.

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): It will make them worse.

Mr. Winnick: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. One way in which the Bill will make things worse is that, whatever the powers against harassment, people with regulated tenancies will be at risk because landlords and property companies will know that, if they can force those tenants out, as Rachman and his associates did the last time there was a Tory rent Act, the accommodation can then be re-let at market rents. The Bill does not apply just to new rented accommodation. All new lets will be subject to market rents.

Mr. Barry Porter (Wirral, South) indicated assent.

Mr. Winnick: The hon. Gentleman nods. I do not know whether he regards that situation as right and proper. He made a brave speech last night and I am happy to give way to him now. If he believes that providing accommodation through the private sector at market rents will do anything to help the people to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) and I have referred, I hope that he will explain how. Those who can afford market rents can almost certainly afford a mortgage, so the people most in need will not be able to take advantage of any provision in the Housing Bill.

Mr. Boateng: The House will have noted that the Secretary of State has vanished. There has been too much talk of homelessness for his liking. Whenever the subject is mentioned within his hearing, his attention begins to wander, he starts to shuffle and shift in his seat and one can be sure that very soon afterwards he will disappear. He has not disappointed us in that respect today, but he must understand that we intend to bring the House back to the issue of homelessness time and again, so he had better get used to it. If he does not like hearing about homelessness, he will be spending very little time with us in the next few hours.

In one sense, the Under-Secretary of State should be relieved that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is no longer with us. The Under-Secretary, who is to reply to the debate—we are glad to welcome him to that position for the first time in a major debate—will appreciate that he is on probation. He has been handed the poisoned chalice of housing.

Mr. Soley: As an ex-probation officer, I have to point out that the last two Ministers responsible for housing did not even complete a year's probation before being put back inside.

Mr. Boateng: They have, indeed, suffered various fates. One has been sent on his travels and relegated to the Foreign Office. The other has been sent to the Back Benches where she now languishes so undeservedly. She could certainly tell the Under-Secretary a thing or two about his right hon. Friend who until recently was sitting beside him. The Under-Secretary must surely realise how difficult his present position is.

Mr. Simon Hughes: In view of their own experiences in the past couple of years, one would expect recent Housing Ministers to have some sympathy with people whose security of tenure is being substantially reduced.

Mr. Boateng: There is certainly nothing assured about the tenancy currently enjoyed by the Under-Secretary, and we shall do all in our power to make his shorthold as short as possible.

Having put the Under-Secretary at his ease, I am glad to see him beginning to rise from his torpor. I was starting to get worried and to wonder whether we were going to have a dead duck on our hands, but he is beginning to stir. The problems of the homeless may not rouse him, but reference to his own future clearly does.

Let us consider the effect of the amendments in the real world rather than in the world interpreted to the other place by the Minister of State. Some of my colleagues, or not so much colleagues as some of those representing the other Opposition parties—the Democrats, SDP Liberals or whatever the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) would like to be called—

Mr. Simon Hughes: Liberal.

Mr. Boateng: We appreciate the hon. Gentleman's difficulty. It is not often that we feel sympathy for him, but on this occasion we do.

Mr. Barry Porter: Get on!

Mr. Boateng: The hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) from a constantly sedentary position says, "Get on!" We shall indeed get on, but we wish that he would get up. Given his knowledge of the leisure and tourism industries, perhaps he has something to say to those in enforced leisure who are camping out under the arches without being tourists. We will get on in our own time.

Having said that, I think that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey was a little hard on the noble Lord, the Minister for Housing, Environment and Countryside. That noble gentleman has responsibility for vast estates in Scotland, so he may understand certain homelessness problems because of difficulties in housing his gillies—[Interruption.] My hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) appears to be somewhat bewildered. A gillie is someone who looks after fish. My hon. Friend's knowledge of fish is probably limited to that which turns up in boxes, usually yellow and with a smiling captain on the front. However, there can be real problems with housing gillies in Scotland.

I have no doubt that the noble Lord will apply his real knowledge of homelessness to his duties as Minister of State. Indeed, there is some sign that he is already doing so, because amendments Nos. 1 and 4 are supposed to reassure housing associations that they will continue to have a role in providing short-term accommodation for the homeless without creating assured tenancies.

I wish to put a number of important questions to the Under-Secretary about the role of housing associations in providing accommodation for the homeless and about how they will work with local housing authorities to fulfil that role. As has been clearly illustrated by a number of my hon. Friends—and even recognised, in his own way, by one Conservative Member—the problem of homelessness is real. It has landed in the lap of local authorities, which are not being given the resources to enable them adequately to tackle it.

In addition, when they seek to meet the difficulties of the time by providing bed-and-breakfast accommodation —highly unsatisfactory accommodation for the homeless —they find themselves, as did my authority, caught in a double bind because of the rate support grant changes. One day they could rely on a certain amount of rate support grant to pay for bed-and-breakfast accommodation, but the next that money was no longer available—it cost my authority £4 million—with all the resulting difficulties in balancing the books and with the very real problem that that presented in fulfilling their legal obligations. Authorities have turned, quite rightly—mine has been doing so for several years, encouraged in rhetoric, but not in fact, by Ministers—to housing associations to meet the challenge of the times and to work together to meet the needs of the homeless.

Bearing in mind what purports to lie behind amendments Nos. 1 and 4—I take the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle)—one would have thought that that would be welcomed with open arms by Ministers; that the Department of the Environment would have hung out the bunting, delighted by the example of a housing association and a local authority working together to meet the needs of the homeless. However, that did not happen—surprise, surprise. I can see a twinkle of recognition beginning to show in the Minister's eyes.

My local authority entered into an arrangement with what was then the Brent people's housing association for the renovation and restoration of a disused office block in Alperton. It was a major and innovatory project which, one would have thought, would meet with approval because of its use of private capital. Not a single penny of ratepayers' money was to be used to restore that office block for use by homeless families. It was all raised on the private market by a progressive relationship between the housing association, the local authority and the developers, Belway Homes—a first-rate developer with a good track record in that area.

The project was arranged, the foundation stone laid and work began—but then what happened? The association—[Interruption.] The Secretary of State has returned to the Chamber. We must talk some more about homelessness. We must not lose the opportunity to talk about the homeless, the homeless, the homeless, the homeless. We are talking about the homeless and we shall continue to talk about the homeless——

Mr. Winnick: Let us vote on it.

Mr. Boateng: No, give Jack his jacket and let us engage in an exercise that raised the right hon. Gentleman's consciousness on this issue. What happened to that innovative project to help the homeless, that partnership between the City of London, the local authority and the housing association? The right hon. Gentleman gets to his feet one day and, in another exercise in local authority bashing, changes the rules yet again. Despite the fact that all the money for the project was raised from private investment—something that usually meets with the Government's approval—we have been told that the development at Middlesex house will count against Brent's capital allocation for housing.

The question that I have put in writing to both the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary, and to which I still await an answer, is whether the Department of the Environment intends to exempt that project from the impact of the Secretary of State's announcement. If we do not receive that assurance we will have cast-iron proof, if proof be needed, that the amendments are an absolute sham and that there is no real intention to enable local authorities and housing associations——

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): Does my hon. Friend agree that the plight of the homeless is of major concern to the Opposition? If the Secretary of State had not objected to certain planning applications, a fair number of homeless people would have been housed by the builder who wanted to build adjacent to the Secretary of State's house.

Mr. Boateng: It is almost as though the Secretary of State had invented the NIMBY principle—not in my backyard. There is no doubt that the proper and judicious application of his planning power could enormously assist in combating homelessness.

If we do not receive an assurance about the Middlesex house project and the difficult position in which Brent now finds itself, we will find it difficult to take at all seriously the Under-Secretary's assurances about the ostensible purpose of amendments Nos. 1 and 4.

Mr. Winnick: Since the Secretary of State is here and much of the debate arising from the amendments has, understandably, been about homelessness, does my hon. Friend know whether the Secretary of State has visited any bread-and-breakfast hostels in his borough or the homeless anywhere else, including those who spend the night on the Embankment, whether covered or uncovered? If the Secretary of State has not, does that not demonstrate once again that he is callously indifferent to the sufferings of those who so concern Labour Members?

6.30 pm

Mr. Boateng: One wishes that the Secretary of State would emulate Mother Teresa in that respect. She took time off from the streets of Calcutta to visit the homeless on the streets of London. One hopes that the Secretary of State will do the same, but I fear that around the Secretary of State there clings not so much the odour of sanctity as the odour of sulphur. To believe for a moment that he is likely to come to Brent or elsewhere to visit the homeless stretches credibility to an extent that would reduce to credibility even the Chancellor of the Exchequer's explanations about how he came to be so seriously misquoted in the Sunday newspapers.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): My hon. Friend's comments may be wholly inaccurate. The short absence of the Secretary of State a few minutes ago may have been so that he could go along the Embankment to Charing Cross to answer our pleas that he should familiarise himself with the problems of the homeless. However, I understand that in reality he went home to water all the little nuclear power stations he has coming up in his garden.

Mr. Boateng: A likely story. One suspects that it is for a quick fix of environmentally safe nicotine that the Secretary of State departs the Chamber. One does not want to speculate why any hon. Member leaves the Chamber, but in the Secretary of State's case we have our suspicions.

I am anxious to encourage the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary of State to give us some assurances tonight about the relevance and impact of the Audit Commission's findings on homelessness and the role of local authorities on amendments Nos. 1 and 4. We know that the report has yet to be published. Is it not strange how many important reports these days remain unpublished and that whenever there are constructive suggestions which may embarrass Conservative Members the report remains unpublished?

We know that the Audit Commission commissioned a report on the responsibilities of housing associations to the homeless. The Under-Secretary of State purports to be concerned about that. The report highlights a growing shortage of homes for rent in both the public and private sectors as the main cause of homelessness rather than the Department of the Environment's view that it is the increasing demand for homes. That may be why the report has never seen the light of day, and I do not think that we are being entirely uncharitable, are we, Mr. Deputy Speaker?

Will the Minister consider whether the Audit Commission makes a valid point when it suggests that housing associations should play a greater role in housing the homeless? If that role is to be fulfilled, the matters which amendments Nos. 1 and 4 purport to be concerned with and the subsidies available to local authorities and housing associations for that purpose must be considered.

Mr. McCartney: I note that the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) has come into the Chamber. Recently he wrote to the Secretary of State pleading with him not to build new homes in his constituency in case they affected his Conservative majority. Given the hon. and learned Gentleman's serious attitude towards building homes in his constituency, perhaps he will stay and give us his views on how he will solve homelessness, at least in his constituency.

Mr. Boateng: It would be interesting to hear what the hon. and learned Gentleman has to say about that, but I suspect that we may not get a response, let alone a satisfactory one.

We need to know from the Under-Secretary whether he recognises the need for the Department of the Environment to consider means of enabling authorities to continue developing leasing arrangements with housing associations and the private sector. What steps does he intend to take to give force to the recommendations of the Audit Commission and when will he publish its findings? We await the Minister's response to that and to the important questions that we have asked him.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I wish to raise with the Minister a limited point on amendment No. 166.

Amendment No. 166 amends paragraph 12(1)(h) of schedule 1 to change the definition of a mutual housing association. The amendment removes the cross-reference to the definition of a fully mutual housing association which is contained in part I of the Housing Associations Act 1985. In that Act a distinction is drawn between a fully mutual housing association, which does not have to be registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act 1965, and a co-operative housing association, which is a fully mutual co-operative but must be registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act 1965.

The difference is that, in section 15(3) of the Rent Act 1977, a tenancy which is created by a registered housing association—one which is registered under the 1965 Act —is not a protected tenancy for the purposes of the 1977

Act. If, on the other hand, the co-operative is not registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, the tenancies will be protected. The significance of that is that under this Bill it will not be possible to create a new protected tenancy. When the Bill becomes law, there will be no more protected tenancies. A tenant will have the protection only of an assured tenancy.

It is true that, even now, a tenancy granted by a co-operative housing association, which is registered under the 1965 Act and with the Housing Corporation, will not be secure. Although the tenants are neither protected nor secure, they have the protection of the overall monitoring and supervision of the Housing Corporation and the detailed protection which exists from membership of an industrial and provident society which is registered under the 1965 Act. If there is oppression, it is possible to make a complaint to the registrar. Thus, if a tenant of a co-operative that is not a secure tenancy made a complaint, the registrar could investigate and the tenant would be afforded some protection as a result of those rights.

The consequence of the amendments is that, in future, a fully mutual association not incorporated under the 1965 Act will not be capable of creating a protected tenancy or, by virtue of paragraph 12(1)(h) of schedule 1, of creating an assured tenancy. Therefore, a tenant of an unincorporated mutual housing association would have no protection under the Rent Act 1977 or the assured tenancy provisions. That is going too far, and I wonder whether the Minister has made a mistake in the definition of a fully mutual housing association. It is difficult to understand the definition of property given in part I of the Housing Associations Act 1985. I ask the Minister to study that and say that, if necessary, there will be further revisions to the Lords amendments to make it clear that the only exemption from assured tenancies will be those granted by co-operatives registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act 1965.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Amendment No. 1 anables housing associations to create temporary lettings for homeless families, especially where it has been decided that they have made themselves intentionally homeless. We clearly welcome the amendment.

I did not intend to speak until the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) made a peculiarly insensitive intervention, which is in character, but as he is not present I shall not be ruder than that.

The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire suggested that the noble Earl of Caithness appreciated the plight of the homeless. I shall not disparage the noble Earl of Caithness because I do not know him and he does not know me. If he visited my advice surgery on a Friday evening, his eyes would be widened in alarm, despair and despondency at the nature of the problems that we face in the east end. The Under-Secretary must understand that Labour Members feel strongly about these problems because it is mainly in our constituencies that they are so concentrated. I should dearly like the Secretary of State to visit my advice surgery, as I have said on a number of occasions. I dealt with 30 housing cases last Friday, with which neither I, housing associations nor the council could deal.

An enormous crisis is developing in London, but the Government are oblivious to it. I do not know whether that is intentional or accidental, but the Secretary of State must experience at first hand what is happening in our capital city and other cities throughout the country.

The hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) mentioned people who intentionally make themselves homeless and young women who become pregnant intentionally to obtain accommodation through the local authority. That happens, and it is the mark of people's despair. Young women think that if they become pregnant they will enhance and improve their chances of being housed by the council. They are sadly mistaken in their action, but it shows how desperate some people are becoming. Regularly, 17 and 18-year-old women with one or two children visit my advice surgery and say, "We have been put in bed-and-breakfast accommodation, but we thought we would get a council flat. They have put us in Westminster, central London or Romford. We are away from the schools and our family. What can we do?" All that I can do is to console them. One feels powerless and angry about the problems created by Government intransigence and by their not allowing local authorities sufficient funds to build the accommodation that is so desperately needed. It is ludicrous that it costs far more to keep a family in bed-and-breakfast accommodation than it does for the local authority to provide accommodation. That is the economics of the madhouse and the social fact of Thatcherism.

6.45 pm

Young women are becoming desperate and think that if they get pregnant they will obtain council accommodation. The Minister knows that that is not so, as do we. Before Conservative Members condemn them, throw their hands in the air and say, "It is their fault and responsibility," they should reflect on their problems—in between laughing. I am sure that this is a humorous aspect of the debate to Conservative Members. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) nods his head. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that it is humorous, there is something wrong with his sense of humour. It seems peculiarly perverted and sick. If he came to my advice surgery, he could see how desperate people are becoming.

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): I was interested in the conversation that was taking place here

Mr. Battle: Have it outside, not in here.

Mr. Patnick: I do not need any advice from the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle).

Mr. Banks: It would be helpful if the hon. Member for Hallam listened. On Second Reading debate of the Rate Support Grants Bill, he showed himself to be very interested in the affairs of the London borough of Newham. We were grateful for his interest, but rather bemused about why he should be so interested. We welcome the interest of Conservative Members as long as they draw lessons from it. The lesson to be drawn from having an interest in the London borough of Newham is the enormous housing crises that it is experiencing.

I hope that, unlike the Secretary of State, the Under-Secretary will accept my invitation to visit my Friday night advice surgery. I realise that he probably has his own surgery, so I shall reciprocate by visiting his and giving him the benefit of my advice. If he does not want to accept my reciprocal offer, will he please come to Newham and see at first hand what is going on?

Mr. Trippier: With the leave of the House. It is nothing short of a tragedy that every time the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) addresses the House he devalues the currency of his contribution by making personal remarks about people inside the Chamber or, on this occasion, outside it. Unlike the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), he is not funny.

I point out to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey, who made allegations against my noble Friend the Minister for Housing, Environment and Countryside that there are three Ministers responsible for housing in the Department of the Environment—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my noble Friend the Minister for Housing, Environment and Countryside and myself. It is rich that the allegation was made by a member of the Social and Liberal Democratic party. Each hon. Member of that party, because of its paucity of Members, has at least 27 subjects or responsibilities to cover.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister is trying to answer a valid point with an invalid one. On his own notepaper, the noble Earl of Caithness is described as the "Minister for Housing". If the Minister informed himself about my party and our disposition, he would know that we each shadow a Department. This is the end of the Session; I am finishing off the Bill because I started it. I shall then hand over to one person who will shadow the Minister and his colleagues. The work load when one person shadows seven is enormous, but we manage pretty well.

Mr. Trippier: That is a matter of conjecture, not a statement of fact. I was merely making the point that I should have thought that it was worth one member of the hon. Gentleman's party concentrating solely on housing. At least we have three who are working at it.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) asked whether the amendments cover private landlords, not merely housing associations. The answer is in the affirmative. There is nothing sinister in believing that there is an important role for private landlords in helping local authorities to discharge their homelessness functions. The amendments will make that possible.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) referred to mortgage repossessions as a percentage of the total number of mortgages granted. The figure remains small. There was a rise in the proportion of building society borrowers in arrears from 0·8 per cent. at the end of 1986 to 0·85 per cent. at the end of 1987, but that was still lower than the June 1987 figure of 0·97 per cent.

Mr. Battle rose——

Mr. Trippier: I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman would allow me to continue. A number of Opposition Members went wide of the specific amendments. I should like to draw hon. Members' attention to the specific amendments, which refer to temporary, not permanent, accommodation.

The Department is looking closely at arrangements for transfer to ensure that councils recognise their continuing obligations to secure permanent accommodation for the homeless. The amendments relate solely to temporary accommodation. We will have an opportunity on Friday to debate these matters in detail. We have already received four reports of significance on this subject while reviewing it and we expect another two, one of which came from the Audit Commission, as the hon. Member for Brent, South suggested.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the hon. Gentleman release details of his Department's report on homelessness, which I understand has been completed but has not yet been made publicly available, either in time for Friday's debate —that is obviously important—or, at the latest, in time for the beginning of the new Session, before any legislation is announced in the Gracious Speech?

Mr. Trippier: I can meet the latter point but not the former. We intend to publish that report.

I return to a specific suggestion made by the Audit Commission on homelessness, to which the hon. Member for Brent, South referred fleetingly. It has been suggested that we may not wish to see local authorities fulfilling their statutory obligations towards homelessness. Nothing could be further from the truth. We have no evidence that any authorities are in any way not fulfilling their statutory obligations. There is evidence via the Observer article last Sunday that there are a variety of diferent approaches to the way that local authorities deal with homelessness. That is of great concern to me and is looming large in the review before the Department. We must introduce more consistent procedures, and our review will consider that.

The hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) made a preposterous suggestion that the Government intended somehow to privatise the homeless. Local authorities cannot delegate their statutory functions. Local authorities will remain responsible for securing permanent accommodation for the homeless. Much of the thrust of the Bill is to concentrate greater attention on the private sector and specifically more on housing associations. The Government believe that the development of the housing association movement—making houses available to those on lower incomes—will allow local authorities to concentrate much more on homelessness. I do not think that that is a matter of dispute between the two sides of the House.

Mrs. Mahon: The report from the Department of the Environment, "Large-scale Voluntary Transfers of Local Authority Housing to Private Bodies", which refers to a local housing authority's duty under section 39 of the Land Compensation Act 1973 and section 28 of the Rent (Agriculture) Act 1976, states:

> "This might be done by entering into contracts with landlords in the area (which might well include the purchasers of the council stock) to provide the necessary accommodation. Similar arrangements would also be acceptable in relation to housing adapted for disabled people or those with special needs."

Does the Minister agree with that?

Mr. Trippier: The point to which I was trying to draw the attention of the House was that local authorities are hardly, if ever, criticised by the Opposition for not dealing with the problems of the homeless. It would be ludicrous for me to suggest that all local authorities can be criticised in a general way. The Opposition must accept, if not publicly then privately, that there is a correlation between the number of empty properties, or voids, within a local authority area and the number of people who are homeless.

Ms. Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): That is not true.

Mr. Trippier: I did not say "direct" correlation; there must be some correlation. It would be unacceptable for the Opposition to believe that the local authorities must improve the management of the housing stock and turn round the empties within a shorter time to create a number of homes which would then come back on to the market. The Audit Commission said exactly that. It said that if empties were turned around within three weeks—the experience in London is more in line with 11 weeks—it would bring 20,000 net houses back on to the market.

Mr. McCartney: I am grateful to the Under-Secretary of State for visiting my constituency and the housing estate on which I live. The hon. Gentleman came across a problem which is the direct opposite of his suggestion. It was an estate which had been refurbished using public sector money and local authority expenditure, and which had new roofs, new heating systems and a new security system. That estate has been boarded up and it may be pulled down. Those refurbished flats cannot find lets. Young homeless people cannot afford the rents because of the changes in housing benefit regulations. Only a fortnight ago the Minister recognised that problem and agreed to come back to me with suggestions on how to deal with it.

Mr. Trippier: When I agreed to go back—I am prepared to go back to the hon. Gentleman's constituency—it was with a view to the local housing authority taking steps to direct refurbishment more specifically to the needs of those people who need the houses, whether they are homeless or not.

Mr. Boateng rose——

Mr. Trippier: I should like to proceed, because I have given way a number of times and am anxious that we should come to the end of our consideration of the Lords amendments.

It is strange if the Opposition do not accept the correlation between the number of empties, the speed of turnround and the number of homeless. It may sound dramatic, but if I were to say that empty council homes mock the overcrowded and the homeless, quite a number of Opposition Members would agree. If I were to say that council homes are empty through inefficiency, I should have thought that the Opposition would be prepared to accept that, but many do not. The hon. Member for Brent, South does not, so let me deal with him.

I have a statement which was made by the Labour chairman of the Hackney housing services committee, Councillor Brynley Heaven, who admits that council homes are empty through inefficiency. He continues:

"Nothing is more important for a housing service than to make the best possible use of all its stock. If we can't show that we are using the homes we already have properly and efficiently, very few people are going to take our case for public investment seriously."

I could not have put it better myself.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Has the Minister finished his speech?

Mr. Trippier: Yes.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) have the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Soley: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, may I say that I had no intention of speaking again until I heard the Minister's appalling speech. If he carries on in this way, he will go the same way as his two predecessors. He did not even begin to answer the debate, which is about the law. It is not about the subject that will be debated on Friday. The debate on Friday about homelessness will not change the law. The questions that we put to the Minister related to changes in the law, but he totally ignored them.

The question is not about empty council houses. Every local authority agrees that there is an element of inefficiency in its organisation, just as there is an element of inefficiency in housing associations, but, on the whole, both local authorities and housing associations are efficient. At any one time, only about 2·5 per cent. of their properties are standing empty. All local authorities and housing associations accept that a small element of the 2·5 per cent. of properties standing empty is due to inefficiency; the percentage will differ from one local authority or housing association to another. However, when the Minister suddenly changed the topic, he did not tell us that no less than 5·9 per cent. of Government-owned properties are standing empty.

Mr. Trippier rose——

Mr. Soley: Sit down for a moment.

One in five of all Metropolitan police houses are standing empty. No fewer than 60 to 70 flats at Wormwood Scrubs are standing empty. They have been empty for nine years. Victorian houses with gardens and three, four or five bedrooms as well as flats that belong to the Home Office are to be bulldozed—for what? A car park and landscaping.

Mr. Trippier: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Soley: No. The Minister will not open his ears to the problem. When his predecessor, the hon. Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe), went to Southend, which has a Conservative-controlled council, she was told that, because of the Government's economic policies, Southend could not cope with its homelessness. Local authority after local authority, both Tory and Labour, has said the same to him.

I am not interested in having that argument now; we can have it on Friday. It will be a good opportunity to debate it. If the Minister wants to deal with it, he can deal with it then, but the House wants an answer to this debate.

Mr. Trippier rose——

Mr. Soley: I shall give way now to the Minister. I hope that he will deal with some of the issues that have been raised in the debate.

Mr. Trippier: The truth is that it was not I who changed the topic. The hon. Friends of the hon Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) changed the topic. They used the debate to ask questions about homelessness. I dealt with the hon. Gentleman's question in the first minute of answering the debate, but he was not prepared to listen. He was talking to his hon. Friends.

Mr. Soley: The Minister did not answer my questions. I was listening to him. All he did was answer the first point. In case he does not understand the amendment, as I suspect he does not, may I say that we are looking at Lords amendment No. 4. The Minister did not answer the questions that we asked about that amendment. He just talked about temporary accommodation. He got into difficulties when he answered my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon). When he said that this has got nothing to do with privatisation, my hon. Friend rightly intervened. All of us have received information from the Department of the Environment; it implies that it is acceptable for local authorities to enter into contracts with private landlords. What does that mean if it does not mean privatising the homeless?

Mr. Trippier rose——

Mr. Soley: Before the Minister gets agitated again, let him listen to the problem so that he can begin to answer it. If a local authority is left with no housing, having transferred all of it under the existing or the proposed legislation, it still has a duty under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 to house the homeless. That is agreed, although there may be arguments about whether the Minister intends to abandon that Act or to undermine it——

Mr. Trippier: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Soley: No; the Minister must listen; he is not even listening properly. [Interruption.] I am sure that Mr. Deputy Speaker is listening properly, but the Minister is not listening properly.

If a landlord is the only landlord in the area who is willing to take the homeless and he keeps them in his accommodation for too long, he will then, as a result of the amendment, be under certain legal obligations that he will seek to avoid. Our questions to the Minister dealt with what would happen then to the homeless. Will they be moved to another landlord, and what will they do if there is no other landlord? Will they be given back to the local authority, and what will the local authority do with them if it does not have accommodation for the homeless? What will happen if a local authority, either deliberately or by chance because the landlord does not realise it, allows a family to stay in the accommodation for longer than the period provided for in the amendment?

The Minister did not address those questions. The nearest he came to it was to say that this was only a temporary problem, but that is not the point. The problem is what will happen when a council puts homeless people into accommodation, the landlord says that they will have to leave and there is no alternative accommodation for them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the Minister seek the leave of the House to speak again?

Mr. Trippier: The hypothetical situation that the hon. Gentleman described could arise, but in the discussions to date, with local authorities wishing to transfer all their stock and housing associations proposing to take over that stock, willingness has been expressed to provide nomination rights to local authorities specifically to house homeless applicants. That willingness would be built into their contractual arrangements.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): The House is being treated with contempt by the Government. During the last few months there have been ministerial changes, procrastination and concessions that were then removed. Tonight a new Under-Secretary of State is not prepared to tell the House what is to happen to thousands of homeless people. It is not good enough for him to say that the Government are discussing with the new landlords the nomination rights that may be agreed between the various parties. We are referring to statutory rights and duties under the law to protect thousands of homeless people.

This Minister comes from the north-west. I invite him to come to Manchester and—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) wants to intervene, he should stand up. His comments on the Bill were a disgrace. If the hon. Gentleman wants to intervene and make a relevant contribution, he should stand up and I would then give way.

Again we ask the Under-Secretary of State to take point by point the questions that have been asked about amendments Nos. 1 and 4 to the Housing Bill. During the last two hours my hon. Friends have asked question after question about its implications. When we have attended public meetings and have met tenant groups, people have scoffed at the way in which this Government have said not one word about the homeless and what is to happen to them.

When, eventually, we pin the Government down to discuss homelessness, the Minister will not answer the questions. We need to know what will happen to people in bed-and-breakfast accommodation at the end of the contract. Will the Minister tell us, and local authorities that have made arrangements with private landlords, what will happen to homeless people at the end of the contract? Will they be moved on and on statutorily from private landlord to private landlord? Are the Government creating an army of homeless people?

Will the Minister have a chat with the Minister of State and give us the answers to the questions that we have asked during the past two hours?

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 2 to 5 agreed to.

Clause 5

SECURITY OF TENURE

Lords amendment: No. 6, in page 3, line 41, at end insert—

"and, accordingly, the service by the landlord of a notice to quit shall be of no effect in relation to a periodic assured tenancy"

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment—[Mr. Trippier.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 8 to 10 and 169.

Mr. Battle: I know that Lords amendment No. 6 is a clarifying amendment, but it would mean that a landlord will need a court order to—[Interruption.]

Ms. Primarolo: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it possible to have two debates in the Chamber at the same time? I cannot hear my hon. Friend.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Lady is quite right. Will hon. Members who are not taking part please retire from the Chamber.

Mr. Battle: The amendment would——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Will hon. Members who are not taking part in the debate please either cease speaking or withdraw from the Chamber?

Mr. Battle: If Lords amendment No. 6 is accepted, a landlord will need a court order to bring an assured periodic tenancy to an end and the notice to quit method will become irrelevant. I should like the Minister to confirm that, rather than merely to move the amendment formally, as there is an assumption that any applicant for a court order will need to have that action preceded by a notice of proceedings for possession. I assume that that principle will be underlined and not undermined. It is a small point, but what I have suggested should be confirmed so that people know where they stand.

A more serious issue is at stake in Lords amendment No. 8. As the Bill stands, clause 7 ties possession action to grounds for possession. The amendment would break that tie for mortgagees—building societies and banks. It appears that a mortgagee would have an arbitrary right to possession. If the tie is broken, institutional privilege will be built into the Bill, as the county court will be able only to suspend the order to give the occupier time to pay by instalments.

There is an important principle at stake. Should mortgagees have special treatment and not have to abide by the general rule? Why are mortgagees being exempted from the general rule? Possession should be linked to grounds for possession. We have had enough rows about grounds for possession and the changes in those grounds, but I hope that the Minister will be prepared to say that he will look into the matter because possession in these circumstances means eviction.

The Minister thought that I spoke about evicted mortgagors earlier, but I did not. He may have mistaken my constituency. I posed questions about the statutory responsibilities of local authorities. I hope that the Minister will consider this matter, as evicted mortgagors represent a high and increasing number of households accepted by local authorities as homeless.

Will the Minister give us an undertaking that mortgage possession grounds cannot be used by business expansion scheme shareholders? We all know that the Budget enabled people to get up £500,000 by setting up a business expansion scheme in private rented property. Will BES shareholders be able to use the clause to get round grounds for possession? The Minister owes it to the House to make that absolutely plain. Will he confirm that BES shareholders will not be classed as mortgagees?

When speaking about Lords amendment No. 10, the Minister in another place said that the issue would be dealt with by regulation. I would like the Minister to repeat that pledge. As he cannot bring it upon himself to make such provision through a clause in the Bill, will he confirm that regulations will cover the point? If not, we are acting in the dark as we are being asked to support proposals whose impact we do not know.

Lords amendment No. 169 ensures that landlords cannot use ground 6 to evict a tenant when the tenant was not aware that development was a possibility when he or she took on the tenancy. Members of the Committee will remember that ground 6 changes a discretionary provision into a mandatory one. If a landlord intends to redevelop a property—it might be a flat or a room—the landlord can use the ground to get the tenant out.

We argued in Committee, it was argued in another place and we still argue, that ground 6 is crucial as it provides far wider scope for people to be evicted than does the Bill. It has been generally accepted in landlord and tenant legislation that if a landlord wishes to seek possession on mandatory grounds, the tenant must have been told that that was a possibility when he or she took on the tenancy. It is crucial that we do not break with that practice. We must ensure that tenants do not lose rights.

Grounds 1 to 5—the other non-fault grounds—require the landlord to ensure that the tenant knows about the possibility of eviction when he or she takes up a tenancy. Ground 6 is the exception. There is no justification for treating it as a special case. The Minister in another place said of landlords that they can use ground 6 only in respect of new tenants who knew that development was a possibility when they took on the tenancies:

> "A landlord who buys a property may not know what his long-term intentions are. It may be clear that there are development possibilities, or it may be an extremely remote prospect. A new tenant who takes on an assured tenancy takes it on against this background. It is one of the grounds for repossession which could be used in certain circumstances. A tenant will make his own assessment of the likelihood of its being used and he can be confident that it cannot be used if there is a possibility of doing the development work around him."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 3 November 1988; Vol. 501, c. 402-3.]

As I cannot question the Earl of Caithness, I ask the Under-Secretary of State to explain how the tenant can have such knowledge in advance. The Earl argued that it is a factor that tenants should take into consideration when considering whether to accept a tenancy, but many take up a tenancy as a result of seeing an advertisement in a newspaper or corner shop window. There is no legal document or legal arrangement. The prospective tenant sees the advertisement and often finds himself knocking on a door during the evening to discuss with the landlord the terms and conditions. The prospective tenant does not arrange for a survey to be prepared and he will not be concerned with the development potential of the flat into which he wishes to move.

If landlords are able to go to court to obtain possession on development grounds, they will have a powerful instrument with which to evict tenants whom they want to get out of their property. These matters are important and the amendment should not be accepted on the nod. I hope that the Minister will take the opportunity to assure tenants that ground 6 will not be an instrument of eviction.

Mr. MacCartney: In my constituency an elderly lady was almost persuaded to leave the house in which she had been living for over 20 years on the ground that the landlord wished to redevelop and improve the property. He began to threaten her when he called for the rent the following week. I found that a planning application had been submitted as the landlord wished to convert the property into a hairdressing shop, and I contacted the local authority's housing aid centre. The lady would have been removed from the property because of the landlord's wish to convert it into commercial premises and to create homelessness. It seems that unscrupulous landlords will be in an even stronger position when they come to deal with elderly ladies, for example. They will be able to winkle them out of their property for reasons other than providing homes for the homeless.

Mr. Battle: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for making that intervention. He is saying that landlords could use ground 6 to drive a coach and horses through any justice for tenants. Landlords could gain access to property by the unjustifiable use of the redevelopment ground. I ask the Minister to accept that there should be inserted in the Bill the principle of natural justice. We should make it plain that the redevelopment clause cannot be brought into play after the tenancy has started. It is clear that ground 6 could be used by a landlord as an excuse to get someone out of his property.

The Earl of Caithness said:

"The problem lies in trying to draft a provision which is sufficiently comprehensive to cover all the options."

I submit that the Minister has a responsibility to ensure that the Bill covers all the options. Tenants should not be left in a position of extreme vulnerability. Lord Caithness added:

"It is in the nature of shady organisations that if you leave a loophole they will find it."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 3 November 1988; Vol. 501, c. 404.]

I hope that the Minister will reassure us that ground 6 will not provide a giant loophole through which unscrupulous landlords—I do not mean all landlords—will drive a coach and horses. I concede that properties might be improved, but the improvements will be made at the expense of the tenants who are thrown out of their homes. Landlords will then bring in other tenants, who will be charged higher rents. In such circumstances, landlords will benefit and tenants will lose. In other instances I shall be interested to see whether the redevelopment takes place.

I invite the Minister to respond to the detailed issues which I have raised, instead of seeking to nod through the amendment formally.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) is right to be concerned, especially about Lords amendment No. 169, to which I shall direct my remarks. Ground 6 of schedule 2 is a mandatory ground for possession. It sets out the circumstances in which a landlord can gain possession. It refers to a landlord who "intends to demolish or reconstruct . . . or to carry out substantial works" within the property. One of the conditions is that it must be impossible to do that work with the tenant in occupation.

I am in the fortunate position of being one step ahead of the hon. Member for Leeds, West. Since 3 March, when the issue was raised by me in Committee—at that time the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) was the Minister for Housing and Planning—I have been pursuing an obvious constituency concern. The Minister gave what I consider to be an unsatisfactory reply. The House will be aware that I represent a constituency in which the opportunity for development at great profit is now enormous, especially along the river. I raised the horrendous prospect that new landlords who took over council property under the provisions in part IV might be able to evict tenants by the use of ground 6, which is mandatory.

The Minister was more than dismissive of my concern. He said:

"The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey made my flesh creep by mentioning the terrifying prospect of developers redeveloping a flat and . . . using ground 7"— which is now ground 6—

"to turn people out. Fortunately, if we read schedule 2 we will see that that cannot happen when a person has paid a consideration for the reversion of tenancy. Therefore, that spectre need not be raised."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G; 3 March 1988, c. 1358.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind hon. Members that they should not pass between an hon. Member who is on his feet and the Chair.

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I pursued the matter by telephone with the Department over the summer. As I did not receive a reply, I wrote to the newly appointed Minister on 3 November. The Under-Secretary of State will be aware that I am grateful for the reply which I received from Lord Caithness yesterday. First, his reply confirms that I was right to be concerned. It seems that there is a possibility—I do not want to be more alarmist than that—that a legal interpretation could confirm that tenants could be evicted. I refer to the advice which has been given, as I understand it, to Ministers.

The advice continues:

"We have looked further at an argument which could affect the picture. This is whether it might in some cases be possible to argue that where, as a result of the consultation procedures, a contract existed between a landlord and tenant prior to transfer, providing for tenancy terms different in major respects from those of the preceding secure tenancy, a court might regard it as a new tenancy taking effect in equity immediately upon acquisition. Our legal advice is that the court would be likely to hold that the tenant was occupying by virtue of the old tenancy rather than a new tenancy in such circumstances. Should a court take the opposite view, however, ground 6 would in principle be available because, on that interpretation, the landlord's interest would have been acquired before the grant of the tenancy."

To say the least, the legality of the relevant provisions is uncertain. It can be said with justification that the provision could be used by unprincipled or profiteering landlords to evict tenants in the interests of redevelopment. That would be the position of those who had moved in after the property had been taken over. The tenants who transferred to the new landlord might all move or might all be asked to move. They might be replaced by new tenants. On any interpretation, they will have been granted new tenancies since the landlord acquired his interest in the dwelling house.

There is every reason to raise a spectre of eviction for present council tenants. In an area such as my constituency, accommodation that is now owned by the council could be bought at low cost and redeveloped as luxury accommodation. That would fail entirely to meet the needs of tenants. The redeveloped property would be outside the price range of the people who live in the property now.

I hope that the Under-Secretary of State and the Secretary of State will accept that there is enormous anxiety in areas close to city centres, in areas that have been developed, particularly in London where house prices have shot through the roof and land prices have escalated enormously, that such housing would be of interest to landlords who wished to redevelop it for up-market renting or for sale at the earliest opportunity. I was grateful to hear that the Minister for Housing, Environment and Countryside accepted that anxiety and so was willing to give some undertakings through the Under-Secretary to the House.

7.30 pm

The Minister, in his reply to me dated 8 November, said:

"I am happy to give you an assurance that we shall discuss with the Housing Corporation ways of ensuring through their use of undertakings attached to Tenants' Choice applicants' approvals that applicants will be required not to use the Ground even should the Courts rule that it was in principle available."

That is a clarification and a concession, and it is a substantial improvement.

First, will the Under-Secretary confirm that the Department of the Environment will ensure that the Housing Corporation makes that requirement in relation to tenants who are resident at the time of transfer and remain in properties and where all tenants are new since transfer? Secondly, will the Minister allay the substantial fears that exist which have in no way been inflamed by any comments that I have made? I have sought to explain that I was seeking clarification, that the Minister had assured me that there was no risk but that, since that did not appear certain to me as a matter of law, I would pursue the matter with the Department of the Environment.

Will the Minister allay the fears of many elderly and low-income tenants that any tenants'-choice-acquiring landlord will never be able to use that ground in any circumstances whatever? We need that assurance. It must be categorical. If it can be given, that will be a substantial improvement in an area about which tenants have been enormously worried.

Mr. Trippier: I am sure that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) accepts entirely from me that that was the sole intention in framing the legislation. There was one part that the hon. Gentleman missed out—I know, not intentionally—of the letter sent to him by my noble Friend the Minister for Housing, Environment and Countryside that I must stress and put on the record. We were satisfied that if the matter were taken to the courts they would uphold the decision. The difficulty on which the hon. Gentleman has focused is that there is no absolute legal certainty in the matter. Therefore, we are attaching belt and braces to this matter and I can give him the latter assurance that he sought.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) asked several detailed questions. The House will know that the amendments deal with the serving of notice to bring a tenancy to an end and the grounds on which possession may be sought.

Amendment No. 6 clarifies clause 5 and provides that a landlord may only bring an assured tenancy to an end by obtaining a court order. The amendment makes it clear that a separate notice to quit is not needed and that if it were served it would not bring the tenancy to an end.

Amendment No. 8, which is a technical amendment, provides that where an assured tenant has mortgaged his tenancy, as could happen with a shared ownership lease for example, and defaults on his mortgage, the provisions of part I will not affect the right of the mortgagee to repossession of the property.

Amendment No. 9 is a consequential amendment following the change made to the suitable alternative accommodation ground for possession. When the ground was switched from part I to part II of schedule 2 as a consequence of representations by Opposition Members, the court was inadvertently given power to order possession under that ground during the course of a fixed-term tenancy. That would be inequitable, and the amendment puts the position right.

Amendment No. 10 makes it a requirement that the particulars of the ground on which the landlord is seeking possession should be set out in the notice. It was always our intention that the particulars should be set out in full in the prescribed form, but, again following Opposition concern in another place, the amendment makes it plain that that will be the case. It responds to those overtures.

Mr. Battle: Will the Minister make it plain, because it is not clear from his reply, whether business expansion scheme shareholders will be exempt from the grounds for possession? Will they have the mortgagee's privilege of bypassing the grounds for possession?

Mr. Trippier: I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman understands the business expansion scheme, but the shareholders in that scheme are far back from those who are proposed landlords. The hon. Gentleman may not understand how the BES works. I do not say that in any way discourteously.

I do not regard the point raised by the hon. Gentleman as a problem. The assurance that he seeks with regard to shareholders is not relevant. I thought that the hon. Gentleman was talking about a landlord. A landlord of a tenancy under the business expansion scheme will have to obtain possession in the normal way. The shareholders are far back. Many individuals will be investing money, as the hon. Gentleman probably understands. Therefore, the matter does not arise. We are talking about literally hundreds of people.

Amendment No. 169 relates to the development ground for possession—ground 6. The ground does not apply where the landlord has purchased the property with a sitting tenant. if that sitting tenant were a Rent Act tenant, there could be an assured tenancy by succession stemming from that tenancy.

Amendments Nos. 6, 8, 9 and 10 are useful clarificatory or technical amendments and, as I have said, amendment No. 169 is a helpful extension of the protection of tenants, for which Opposition Members have asked.

Mr. Simon Hughes: With the leave of the House, I should like to say a few words.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I take it that the hon. Gentleman has the leave of the House to speak again.

Mr. Hughes: As the Minister will have expected, I am grateful for his comments. However, he did not deal with one important matter, on which he may wish to take advice.

When a matter is dealt with by way of Government policy or undertaking, any court interpreting statute can look only at the face of the statute. Courts are not allowed, as a matter of law, to take into account debates in the House. That principle of legal interpretation is not used in this country, although it is used elsewhere. Will the Minister assure us that his assertion and assurance will apply as a matter of law as well as a matter of policy?

I am aware that the Minister can determine the rules and parameters within which the Housing Corporation works. I am also aware that it is the intention, as he has clarified, that the ground should not be used. The problem is, as he will realise, that in a legal context he and his colleagues and the Housing Corporation will not be parties. A landlord who had acquired the property would be taking a tenant who was in the property to court, using a ground in statute. That is the perfectly reasonable justification for a question that I hope the Minister will be able to answer. I hope that he will say that, as a matter of statute, if it is not certain now, the matter will be clarified in the early housing legislation expected after the Queen's Speech.

Mr. Trippier: I think that I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he seeks on the latter point. As I said earlier, this is not a matter of law, and therefore not a matter of statute. However, I am not a qualified lawyer, so I shall take advice. The hon. Gentleman may have raised the question because he suspects that it is not. The reply that he has received from my noble Friend the Minister for Housing, Environment and Countryside made that abundantly clear. Otherwise, the direction that we are seeking to give to the Housing Corporation would be unnecessary.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 7 to 10 agreed to.

Clause 17

SUCCESSION TO ASSURED PERIODIC TENANCY BY SPOUSE

Lords amendment: No. 11, in page 13, line 11, at end insert

(c) he became entitled to the tenancy as mentioned in section 39(5) below."

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Right hon. and hon. Members will be aware that clause 17 establishes the right of succession to an assured tenancy for the spouse or common law spouse of a deceased assured tenant. The Bill in its original form did not provide a right of succession to an assured tenancy, but after strong representations from Opposition Members we agreed to provide a right of succession for the spouse of an assured tenant, as for someone who was living with the assured tenant as man and wife. However, it is a single right of succession for the spouse alone.

This amendment blocks a small loophole in the succession provision. Most new tenancies granted after commencement will be new assured tenancies—the results of new tenancy agreements. However, some tenants will become assured tenants by succession. They will be family members who have succeeded to a Rent Act tenancy. When a Rent Act tenant dies, his spouse will have the right to succeed to his Rent Act tenancy, and when that spouse dies, a family member who has fulfilled the residence qualification will have the right to succeed to an assured tenancy. That family member could then marry and, without this amendment, her or his husband or wife could succeed to the tenancy. So the property would have seen three successions in which the landlord had no say.

If the landlord is willing to grant an assured tenancy voluntarily to the spouse of the family member, that is an entirely different matter. However, we do not want to perpetuate successions over which the landlord has no control. This is a small amendment to ensure consistency in our succession provisions, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Simon Hughes: This may be a small amendment, and one that closes a loophole, but the Minister will be aware that this provision was the subject of controversy in Committee. This clause deals with succession rights, and closing the loophole will take away a right that currently exists. It will be of harm specifically to single and elderly single people. There was opposition from all parts of the Committee upstairs to reducing succession rights. This amendment is a backward step, and I greatly regret that the Minister is asking us to agree with the Lords amendment.

The noble Earl who introduced this amendment in another place made it clear that he had heard it argued strongly that tenants would not automatically negotiate joint tenancies for a husband and wife, and therefore that great hardship would be caused to widows if there was no automatic succession.

I shall give the Minister a simple and obvious example of the way in which this change will remove the assurance of security. It is the example of an elderly mother of 85 living with her son, aged 60, and daughter-in-law, aged 55, who move in to the mother's home specifically to look after her. When the mother, as a Rent Act tenant, dies, the son could succeed to the assured tenancy, but when he dies his wife cannot do so. By that time, the wife might be elderly and well past pensionable age, yet she will be prevented from succeeding to the tenancy by this amendment.

The arguments are known to the Government; they put the arguments themselves in another place. It is an unsatisfactory element of this Bill that succession will be denied to those who are vulnerable and need the security of their homes.

The Government take the philosophical view that three successive tenancies are bad. They are not. I can think of many constituents, as can other right hon. and hon. Members, who will suffer greatly from this amendment. My hon. Friends and I tabled an amendment asking the House to disapprove of it, but it has not been taken. However, I give notice that we shall oppose Lords amendment No. 11 if it is put to the House later this evening.

Mr. Allan Roberts: We share the view of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) that this is not just a small, technical amendment, as described by the Minister. It touches on a major point of principle that was debated at great length in Committee and that divided this House on a number of occasions during earlier stages of the Bill.

The Minister says that the Government do not want three successions without the landlord having any control. That is an insult to the tenants of private landlords. Under this amendment, the relative of a tenant who dies will not be allowed to continue living in what has become home. That is what we are talking about.

Mr. Trippier: No, we are not.

7.45 pm

Mr. Roberts: The Minister, from a sedentary position, contradicts me; let us consider the facts. Under this amendment, when a person succeeds to a Rent Act tenancy, the spouse will have no right of succession—even though clause 17 gives a right of succession to spouses of assured tenants. If someone has lived somewhere for longer than two years, I would call that his home. Thus, for a relative to be unable to succeed in such circumstances is to deny to him the right to continue living in his own home.

It used to be the case that relatives entitled to succeed needed a six-month residential qualification. Under the Housing Act 1985, the qualification period was reduced to one year, but under this legislation, there will be a two-year residential qualification. Is the Minister saying that, if a person has lived somewhere for two years, that still cannot be deemed to be his home? I say that it certainly is.

In establishing the concept of the assured tenancy—in the past, we have made it clear that the only assured thing about these tenancies, unlike those of the 1980 Act, is that there is nothing assured about them and that they are very insecure—the Government go on to take away what limited rights relatives and spouses have. The whole idea behind this legislation and of destroying security of tenure among the tenants of private landlords, is that private landlords will more easily be able to get vacant possession of their property. That is what the Government argue.

That in itself will be a major factor in increasing homelessness. I do not want another debate on that aspect because we dealt with the matter of homelessness in the first group of amendments. Nevertheless, it is wrong for Conservative Members to claim that the main cause of homelessness in Britain is the same as in every other country in the western world, that it is a problem that will never go away, and that it has nothing to do with housing policies but is a social problem. This is an example of Government legislation that could, by taking away security of tenure, increase the number of people presenting themselves as homeless.

Under Lords amendment No. 11, if an assured tenant dies, the relatives living in the same house can be made homeless. If relatives are not allowed to succeed to the tenancy, the individuals or families will have to go to the local authority and present themselves as homeless. They will not have been made so intentionally but will have been put in that dilemma by the Government's legislation. Let not the Minister say that we are simply blocking a small loophole. This is a major issue of principle relating directly to our debates on succession. We believe that anyone who lives for a reasonable time in the tenancy of a private landlord should have succession when the tenant dies.

There was such a case some time ago in my constituency. Two elderly sisters had lived together for most of their lives in a terraced property, renting from a private landlord. The sister who died first was the tenant. The other sister, who had been there for 40 or 50 years, was going to be refused the right of succession. Only when we invited Granada Television to come along and interview the sisters did the landlord decide to change his mind—or her mind; it was difficult to ascertain exactly who the landlord was, although we knew the identity of the agents.

It would have destroyed that elderly person to have to accept that the house that had been her home for 30 or 40 years would be taken away, and this little "technical" amendment will result in many such cases.

Mr. Heddle: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, particularly as I was not in the Chamber for all his speech. I am sure that he has no wish to mislead the House now any more than he did when he cited similar examples in Committee. But he has just reminded the House that the two sisters had lived together for 30 or 40 years—he said 50 years first and then amended that. He will acknowledge from his experience of housing law that those two sisters would have been controlled and then regulated tenants, with all the security of the courts. The younger sister, being a direct relation of the deceased, would have succeeded to the tenancy.

Mr. Roberts: They did not have that kind of tenancy. If they had, we would have succeeded when we put the lawyers on to the case, without having to involve Granada Television.

What the Minister describes as the right of relatives to inherit tenancies was the reasonably fair position before the present legislation was presented. The Government must admit that their avowed purpose is to make it more difficult for tenants to remain if landlords want to evict them. The Government argue as a matter of principle that one of the reasons for the lack of an adequate supply of private rented accommodation is that landlords cannot get rid of tenants easily enough, and cannot obtain vacant possession when they want it.

The amendment is intended to enable landlords to obtain vacant possession when someone dies who has succeeded to an assured tenancy following the death of a spouse who was a Rent Act tenant. All relatives from that time would cease to have tenancy rights. The Minister admitted that he would make the third succession and any beyond it illegal if the landlord did not want to grant succession.

We think that that is wrong, and that people should have security of tenure whether they are tenants or not, as long as it is clear that the accommodation has been their main home for a reasonable period. We thought that six months was reasonable. We thought that a year, under the 1985 Act, was reasonable. Now the period is two years, and even so the Government in their miserable amendment are trying to take away tenants' rights and to increase the possibility of homelessness. The Minister says that they are trying to close a loophole. We say that they are trying to destroy the major principle of security of tenure.

Mr. Trippier rose—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the Minister the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Trippier: I ask the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) very seriously to read Hansard tomorrow. When he came out with his example, I was convinced that the person to whom he referred could succeed to the tenancy. I subsequently received advice from the Box that confirmed that I was right. As I understood it, the wife in his example was the tenant. The son who succeeded to the Rent Act tenancy would be the first successor. The hon. Gentleman said that the daughter-in-law could not succeed to the tenancy. I am saying to the hon. Gentleman that that person could succeed as a second successor.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister may well be right. It depends on the status of the original tenant. If the mother had inherited the tenancy from her husband, for example, her carers who moved in might find themselves without succession rights.

Mr. Trippier: I shall not delay the House for much longer, and I have no doubt that there will be an exchange of correspondence between the hon. Gentleman and myself.

This is the point that I wished to make to the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts). If there had been two successions to a Rent Act tenancy—which is what the hon. Gentleman was talking about; he was talking about depriving people of rights that they already had—and the second successor was a family member, the family member's spouse would have no automatic right of succession. There has never been such a right. It is wrong for the hon. Gentleman to give the House the impression that we are taking away rights that already exist.

Mr. Allan Roberts: I assure the Minister that I would not suggest that any rights were being given that did not already exist, and I am sure that what he says is correct. But let us clarify the matter, because there was some confusion in the Minister's exchanges with the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). When a wife or husband succeeds to an assured tenancy from a Rent Act tenant who dies, the next of kin—even if there has been a remarriage and there is another spouse—will not inherit that tenancy under the amendment.

Mr. Trippier: I could not have made this clearer than I did in my opening remarks. I gave my own example—we have had several since. I appreciate that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey wishes to divide the House, but I seriously ask whether he knows on what he is dividing it. We are not depleting the current legislation or removing tenants' rights.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The Minister must remember what his colleagues said in the Lords—that the amendment was to close a loophole because it was not Government policy to allow three people to succeed in a row. Loopholes have been closed elsewhere, but not in this context. At present there is a guarantee of security where the tenant was protected under the Rent Act. We want to sustain that, and the Minister wants to take it away. That is a very good reason for dividing, if the Minister persists in his aim.

Mr. Trippier: We do not want to take the right away. I suggest that it does not exist, but the hon. Gentleman is right to divide the House if that is what he believes. We are not prepared to extend the legislation to cover a third succession.

Mr. Roberts: Does clause 17 give the right of succession for spouses of assured tenancies, except where it is the third succession? Is that the case or not?

Question put, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment:—

Clause 20

ASSURED SHORTHOLD TENANCIES

Lords amendment: No. 12, in page 14, line 26, after "is" insert "a fixed term tenancy"

8.15 pm

Motion made and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Trippier.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendments Nos. 13 to 17.

Mr. Tony Banks: These amendments relate to assured shorthold tenancies—a difficult phrase to say if one has paid a visit to the Strangers' Bar, but I have not so far this evening and will not for some time yet.

The Government know that we are very concerned about assured shorthold tenancies because we believe that this form of letting will destroy security of tenure in the private rented sector. There is a play on words here. Heard the first time, "assured tenancy" sounds like something that might enhance the rights of tenants—a good thing; but the Government have perverted the English language, and assured tenancy actually diminishes certain rights.

These amendments tighten up the definition of assured shorthold tenancies, so I welcome them because they will ensure that such tenancies can be created only in extremely limited circumstances, when landlords and tenants are fully aware of the implications of the bargains they are about to strike. We discussed that at length in Committee but could not persuade the Government of our case. Fortunately, these Lords amendments provide what we sought then.

Lords amendment No. 12 includes in its definition the words "a fixed term tenancy", which clarify what an assured shorthold letting for a short period is, the minimum being six months.

Lords amendment No. 13 deals with the contractual terms of a tenancy. We are pleased to agree with it, as it provides that, if a landlord inserts a break clause into a shorthold agreement, the tenancy cannot be an assured shorthold tenancy. We are concerned that the wholesale creation of assured shorthold tenancies will lead to the destruction of security of tenure for private tenants.

The Bill creates two new forms of tenure—assured tenancy and assured shorthold tenancy. The first, we are told, will give some security with market rents; the other provides less security, but with correspondingly lower rents. The point that the Government have conspicuously failed to answer relates to assured shorthold tenancies. If a tenancy is for six months, how is the tenant to enforce his right to a reduced rent? The Government have told us repeatedly that landlords do not always want to twist tenants, and have always assumed that tenant and landlord come together as equally powerful parties. That might be so in legal terms under this legislation, but the reality is quite different.

We all know many examples of tenants' rights being ignored by landlords. Obviously, the former can go to law to try to pursue their rights, but the people we are talking about often do not possess the economic wherewithal to do that and may not understand what their rights are. That is why we have always tried to load the balance in favour of the tenant. That does not necessarily make us an anti-private landlord party, but experience and our constituency caseloads show us that things must be weighted in favour of the tenant.

There are far more private landlords who are crooked and unfair twisters than there are tenants who are prepared to dupe landlords. I agree that such cases happen from time to time, but they are rare. In the great preponderance of constituency casework of Labour Members—and, I suspect, of Conservative members in inner cities as well—it is the tenant who is at a disadvantage and the landlord who is deceiving and tricking the tenant. That is why we always want to be seen as the party of the tenant—whether the private or the council tenant. We are proud to be the party of the tenant and we are not prepared to accept the Government's criticism that we are wholly one-sided, because we speak from experience.

If the tenant asks for a reduced rent or applies to a rent assessment committee, the landlord's obvious response will be, "OK, you can get out at the end of your tenancy." That is true of the other rights that tenants have. What about repairs, for example? Hon. Members will know of cases in which tenants have asked for repairs to be done but the landlord has ignored them. The roof may be leaking, for example. How do the Government think——

Mr. Heddle: I rise to ask whether it is reasonable for the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick), who has been in the House for many years, to be reading the daily newspaper rather than listening to the words of so-called wisdom of his hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks)?

Mr. Winnick: I can show you, Mr. Speaker, or the Clerk that I have been making marks of rented accommodation that is available in London and the rents payable. I shall use that information at a later stage. I have been marking page 38 of the Evening Standard, as you can see, Mr. Speaker, and I consider it to be part of my responsibility to do so.

Mrs. Mahon: The hon. Gentleman should apologise.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that that is probably just about in order.

Mr. Banks: I am prepared to accept my hon. Friend's explanation, because no one would read the Evening Standard for pleasure. He can be paying it such close attention only in the interests of research—although I must ask him who won the 3.30. I know that my hon. Friend is more than capable of carrying out research and listening to me at the same time—and he can probably carry out a number of other bodily functions at the same time.

I was talking about the case of a tenant asking a landlord to deal with a property that is in a state of disrepair, with, for example, a leaking roof. What is the tenant's position in such a case? Although there has been much criticism of local authorities because of the state of disrepair of some council properties, the fact cannot be avoided that the greater disrepair and dilapidation has been in the private sector. Conservative Members know that that is true. The most distressing cases that one deals with at constituency advice centres are those that occur in the privately rented sector.

Mr. Heddle: The hon. Gentleman has just reminded the House that his party is the party of the tenant. Will he confirm that it is in the private sector that the tenant has the rights and protection of the law against disrepair and that it was this Government who recently introduced the same rights for tenants with local authority landlords to protect them in cases where properties have been allowed to fall into disrepair?

Mr. Banks: The hon. Gentleman's comments fly in the face of reality. I realise that he may be more interested in what my hon. Friends are doing than in listening to what I am saying. I was saying that, although rights will be given under the Bill, and although rights exist under other legislation, many tenants do not have the economic capacity or general awareness to pursue those rights. That is the point that I am trying to make. That is why, throughout the passage of the Bill, it has been the Labour party which has tried to tilt the balance in favour of the tenant, to make the situation as straightforward and simple as possible and to ensure that the tenant has many rights without having to resort to the law.

Ms. Primarolo: Does my hon. Friend agree that if a tenant in the private sector withholds rent to secure repairs, that tenant will fall foul of a possession order, under the mandatory provisions of the Bill? What the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) has just said about protection on repairs is a load of rubbish. That protection will be superseded by the mandatory eviction provisions in the Bill.

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend is more direct in her language than I am, but I do not dissociate myself from her words. She has made a good point. A court will have no discretion over eviction for rent arrears. We shall debate later the provisions that deal with the right to buy, which include a scheme whereby tenants who want to buy their homes from the council can hold money back, if there is a delay, and put it into a fund that will effectively qualify as their mortgage payment in the future. The Government want to load everything against the local authority. They see the local authority as the enemy of the people.

Mr. Trippier: That is rubbish.

Mr. Banks: I do not know how much attention the Minister has paid to the Bill at various stages. We have found that not only the Bill but the general drift of legislation is based on the assumption that the local authority is the enemy of the people. I do not want to speak on a subject outside the scope of the amendment, but, as we are the party of the tenant, we consider the Government to be the enemy of the local authority. In their eyes, the local authorities can do nothing right. The House knows that taking all housing away from local authorities is on the Government's agenda. I ask Conservative Members to speak if that is not true. I see that no Conservative Members have risen to speak, so it is obviously true. We have discovered another item on the hidden agenda.

Mr. Soley: The previous Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, who was sacked—although not for this reason—said that the Government took the view that councils should no longer be providing accommodation. That was also implied in the White Paper in October 1987, and other Ministers have said the same in Committee. They believe that local authorities have no role as providers of housing.

Mr. Banks: Too few people in this country know of the true intentions of the Conservative Government. Labour Members who have attended public meetings about the Bill have noticed a large number of elderly tenants there. We do our best to explain fairly and impartially what the Government seek to achieve. Unfortunately, that seems to frighten the audience more then if we made things up as we went along.

Many elderly tenants come to the meetings because they can remember what private landlords were like and they know that it was the local authority who removed them from the ghettoes of the private landlord. Even the worst local authority is infinitely better than the worst private landlord. That is why people are worried about the Bill, which has nothing to do with the provision of additional housing but everything to do with trying to take the provision of housing away from local authorities.

Mr. McCartney: I have a copy of the Government's discussion paper on housing in rural areas which was issued on 5 July 1988. Paragraph 1 says:

"Local authorities would increasingly act as enablers who would facilitate the provision of new housing by others".

Paragraph 3(1) says that there is a need to "extend the role of the housing associations in rural areas so that they can take over from local authorities some of their responsibility as the providers of new housing for rent".

The Government made it clear during the summer that they would remove local authorities from their role as providers of housing.

Mr. Banks: I accept the point that my hon. Friend has made, which we are driving home time and again. I only wish that more people outside the House, such as the council tenants who sit reading The Sun, the Daily Mirror, the Daily Express and The Star could read in those newspapers about what the Bill really intends, rather than reading about the latest fashion that has been draped over Princess Diana.

Mrs. Mahon: My hon. Friend referred to the elderly. I recently held a surgery in the town centre of Halifax where two out of three council tenants are elderly people. My hon. Friend's point about the past was repeatedly emphasised by elderly people who said, "Please tell the younger ones about the private landlords." The experiences that they related to me were quite shocking. I ask the Minister to consider the experiences of those elderly people, who do not want a return to the bad old days of the private landlord.

8.30 pm

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. Her experiences echo mine. Younger council tenants, and younger people generally, may not be aware of those circumstances. They have had their minds dulled by the propaganda of the Right-wing press and have not had the experiences that their mothers, fathers and grandparents have had.

People are worried about the Bill because they do not have the Government's confidence and faith in private landlords. The Government seem to have infinite faith in the ability of private landlords not only to meet our housing shortage but to do the decent thing by tenants. I do not know how they can maintain that position, because it seems to fly in the face of experience.

Mr. Trippier: If the hon. Gentleman returned to the matter that we are discussing, he would discover that amendments Nos. 12, 13 and 16 are designed to assist the tenant. They meet points raised by the Opposition either in the House or in another place to which we have responded positively. We have not heard much about that.

Mr. Banks: I made it quite clear to the Minister that I was speaking in favour of the amendments. I said at the beginning that we welcomed the fact that the Government gave way in the end; of course we welcome it. However, we need to spell out the implications of the Bill and the problems of tenants because we are the party of the tenants.

Mr. Trippier: What arrogance.

Mr. Banks: If the Minister feels miffed because I have not given him sufficient credit I shall gladly do so now. I shall give him all the credit he wants. I only wish that he had been so welcoming of our other proposals.

Mr. Soley: My hon. Friend should not give the Minister too much credit. To be fair, this Minister was not in the job at the time, but Ministers dealing with the Bill in Committee consistently refused to give genuine safeguards against serious harassment. Every organisation with experience of housing knows that the dangers of abuse are far greater under the Bill. The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) knows that, too, especially in relation to the business expansion scheme—about which he has anxieties—which will also be covered by the Bill. Although the Government moved a little way when pushed by the Lords, the amendments go nowhere near solving the problems that my hon. Friend describes.

Mr. Banks: I just thought that the Minister was getting a little upset. As he is a new boy in this job, I do not want to get him too upset too early. There will be plenty of time to get him really upset. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) will realise that my welcome was not excessive. Of course we welcome the amendments. We are very reasonable people. Reason is on our side, and it would be unreasonable and churlish of us not to admit that the Government have given way to pressure from the Opposition. It is the role of the Opposition to exert such pressure.

The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mr. Heddle) said that tenants had rights under the Bill. I was referring to the tenant who finds that the property in which he or she lives is in a state of disrepair and who goes to the landlord to ask him what he proposes to do about it. The landlord can say, "I shall kick you out of the property and get myself another shorthold tenant straight away." That can happen under the Bill.

If the tenant is so bold as to complain about the state of repair of the property and to seek to get the landlord's obligation to undertake repairs enforced, what progress is he or she likely to make? The hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire knows better than I how long it takes to get a county court hearing for a case of breach of covenant of repairing obligations under section 11 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985. Would the hon. Gentleman care to hazard a guess? Once a survey has been carried out and an application made for a hearing, months of delay may follow. In my constituency, tenants with excellent solicitors have not been able to obtain a full hearing until 18 months after their original complaint. That is crazy. The tenant may have rights, but unless those rights can be speedily, cheaply and easily enforced, they do not amount to much. Therefore, although I welcome the amendments, they beg an awful lot of questions.

Lords amendment No. 13 is welcome because it provides that a clause in the contract terminated before the end of the initial six-month period would ensure that the tenancy would not be an assured shorthold tenancy. Lords amendment No. 14 is less welcome, because the Government appear to be displaying paranoia that is unnecessary in the circumstances. They appear to be worrying about assured shorthold tenancies that have come to an end during their term either because the tenant has left or because some other change has taken place. They are ensuring that if the tenancy starts again it remains an assured shorthold tenancy and does not become a full-blown assured tenancy.

Amendment No. 15 emphasises the distinction, so that when the original tenancy comes to an end, an assured tenancy is not created but the new tenancy is still an assured shorthold tenancy. Why does the Minister feel so strongly about those two amendments? I have been knocking around with the Bill for some time, but I still find some aspects difficult to understand.

Amendment No. 16 seems to play word games, and I cannot see the point of it or of amendment No. 17. Perhaps the Minister will explain exactly what amendments Nos. 16 and 17 achieve. I am sure that he has an excellent brief from his civil servants and I shall be pleased to hear precisely what the two amendments do.

Opposition Members would not wish to be churlish. We are pleased that our arguments have been listened to, and even if the amendments do not go half as far as we would want them to, we are prepared to accept them.

Mr. Trippier: It is clear from the remarks of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) that he does not intend to divide the House. I shall briefly address the questions that he puts.

Amendments Nos. 12, 13 and 16 are designed to plug the loophole in the shorthold procedure which could work to the disadvantage of tenants. Clause 20 provides that, to qualify as an assured shorthold tenancy, a tenancy must be granted for a certain term of at least six months. We do not want landlords to be able to circumvent that requirement by granting six-months tenancies with a power to determine the tenancy—in other words, bring it to an end—at some point before the minimum six-months term is up.

Amendments Nos. 14, 15 and 17 are aimed at the case where an assured shorthold tenancy ceases at some time during its life to qualify as an assured tenancy because the tenant no longer occupies the property as his principal home.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West has given the impression that Ministers—specifically, those in the Department of the Environment—are not in favour of local government or of housing in any way being managed by local authorities. The vast majority of Ministers in the Department of the Environment come from a background of local government and we are very strongly in favour of local government where it is efficiently run. The sad fact is that in many cases it is not efficiently run, as I tried to illustrate in an earlier debate.

Mr. Soley: In view of what has been said by the Minister's predecessors, that is an important point. Is the Minister saying that he wants local authorities to continue to have a role in the provision of housing into the future, and if so, that the Government have given up their attempt to make local authorities get rid of all their properties? Does he want local authorities to be providers or only enablers as in the terms of the White Paper? That was the distinction drawn. What is the Minister saying to the House?

Mr. Trippier: I am saying—and the Government have said and other Ministers have said—that we want local authorities to be principally enablers.

Mr. Soley: But not entirely?

Mr. Trippier: Principally enablers. It is stretching credulity to breaking point for the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) to suggest for one moment that the whole of the public housing stock run by local authorities will be transformed and transferred within very short order. I have already touched on that point. There is a balance to be achieved. I have already said in a previous debate that I think that there is an important role for local authorities to deal with the problem of homelessness. The more we can encourage the private sector, principally housing associations, to concentrate on those low-cost housing—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Newham, North-West sneers at that.

Mr. Tony Banks: I am not sneering—I am smiling.

Mr. Trippier: You were smiling and sneering. The same question is given to this side of the House by your hon. Friends as to what they would feel about housing——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sneering at anything.

Mr. Trippier: Therefore, if there is a role in relation to homelessness for local authorities and housing associations, it is clear that if we are successful with this Bill in promoting private homes for rent through housing associations it will allow local authorities to concentrate on those people who are homeless and to give greater attention to that sector. I shall repeat that point again on Friday.

Mr. Soley: I do not wish to stray out of order, Mr. Speaker. The debate has been about the ability of local authorities and other people to cope with aspects such as homelessness in the past, but we have passed through that debate and this debate has been about certain aspects of security for tenants. The Minister, however, in his remarks has indicated a very different position from that indicated by other Ministers both recently and in the more distant past. I am anxious to get the Government to clarify what they are saying.

I noticed that, on my intervention, the Minister slightly altered his words to say that he did not expect local authorities to get rid of housing in short order—I think that that was his phrase—but may I take it that the Minister recognises and accepts that the aim of the Government as laid down by previous Ministers is to get rid of all provision of council housing when they can? That has been stated in so many words and sometimes very explicitly by the hon. Gentleman's predecessors. He seemed to move away from it just now and then in his closing remarks he seemed to move back again.

May we have the position made clear? Is the hon. Gentleman of the view that at some date in the future, perhaps a long time in the future, the view of the Government is that local authorities will not be providers of housing at all? Or is he saying that there will always be a role for local authorities in providing housing? All the evidence from the Government so far—their actions, their statements on the record here and the written answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick)—is that the Government took the view that local authorities could give it all up sooner or later. The Minister moved away from that and then waffled a bit. I want to know what his position is.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman and I have been Members of the House for long enough to know precisely the game that he is seeking to play. I could not make it any clearer to him. Perhaps he would care to consider Hansard tomorrow and see what I have said. I have made it absolutely crystal clear. In contrast to that of the Labour party, the Government's policy for the next Parliament is stated clearly in the Conservative manifesto. Therefore, all that is said on housing—I re-read it this morning—could not have been clearer. We are exposing local authorities in their control of housing to competition, and providing the opportunity through this legislation for tenants to give their local council the sack. The hon. Member for Hammersmith does not like that because he and many of his hon. Friends believe that the council estates are their sole preserve. [Interruption.] We have heard it again from his hon. Friends on the Back Bench. I have never heard such arrogance.

Mr. Soley: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not wish to trade arguments with the Minister. We shall have an opportunity to do that when it is appropriate and in order to do so. All that I want to ask at this point is this. If the wording in Hansard suggests that the Minister has in fact stated a position different from that which Ministers previously stated, will it be in order for me to raise the matter tomorrow or at the earliest sitting of the House after the Official Report is made available?

Mr. Speaker: That is hypothetical at the moment. The hon. Gentleman can check the record and no doubt we can deal with it at the time.

Question put and agreed to

Lords amendments Nos. 13 to 17 agreed to.

Clause 22

REFERENCE OF EXCESSIVE RENTS TO RENT ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE

Lords amendment: No. 18, in page 16, line 9, leave out "if".

8.45 pm

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take Lords amendment No. 19.

Mr. McCartney: I had intended to wait for the Minister's explanation and then point out how inadequate it was. Little did I know how inadequate it was to be, especially as there was considerable discussion about this point in another place. Indeed, one of the main protagonists in that debate is here today. The amendment deals with the referral of excessive rents to the rent assessment committee—the RAC—which was established to get rid of the rent officer and the local rent committees. Despite the inadequacy of the Minister's comments, it is important to take account of the intention behind the amendment and to explain why the Opposition regard it as insufficient to allay our fears about what will really happen in the market place.

The landlord's power to determine the type of tenancy is especially significant in areas of housing stress. In many respects, the landlord's power to determine whether it is an assured tenancy or an assured shorthold tenancy will to a large extent determine the protection for the tenant or potential tenant. It is significant that, in using that power, the landlord can negotiate rents higher than those set by the rent assessment committee. I shall return to that in a moment.

As the Minister was not prepared to explain the Government's position, it is incumbent on me to set out what the Government's position was when the matter was debated in another place. In that debate, the Earl of Caithness said:

"As noble Lords will by now be well aware, we on this side of the House start from the proposition that the rent for an assured tenancy should be first and foremost a matter for free negotiation and agreement between landlord and the tenant. That, in our view, is a necessary and entirely proper feature of the free market principle which we are seeking to apply to private rented housing.

Thus under the new regime the landlord and tenant will be free to negotiate not only the initial rent for the tenancy but also—if they wish—a contractual procedure for reviewing that rent at subsequent intervals. In cases where they do agree on such a procedure, that procedure will be binding on both parties with no provision for it to be overridden by statute. The primacy of contract is absolutely fundamental to our thinking in this respect."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 3 November 1988; vol. 501, c. 399]

The principle behind this is the free market, but in areas of housing stress how can landlord and tenant be free on a balanced basis to negotiate rent levels and terms of tenancy? In reality, that will never be the position. The tenant or potential tenant will always be in a take-it-or-leave-it situation and significantly under pressure when it comes to determining the level of rent.

In terms of legal status, this is a unique attempt to write into legislation in this country the ability of a landlord or other person to make an agreement which removes the contractual rights, legal obligations and right to seek legal redress from the terms of a contract. No such principle exists in any other part of English law. Indeed, employment law is quite the opposite—no employer can force an employee to agree to the removal of his rights. Yet the noble Lord said that, once a tenant had come to an arrangement with a landlord, no matter that it be under pressure, the tenant's ability at a later date to seek redress through the RAC would be ultra vires.

I know of cases where landlords have put considerable pressure on tenants to vary their rent arrangements. In Wigan, that often happens with homes in multi-occupation. Young women living on their own are especially vulnerable. The landlord says that he wants an extra £5 or £7 a week, and if the tenant is not prepared to pay, the landlord will subdivide the tenancy and bring in another person to share that accommodation. I know of one recent case of a young woman having the only room that she rented split into two. The landlord attempted to put in another woman to share that accommodation because the tenant said that she could not afford to pay more than the rent that had originally been agreed.

Tenants are harassed by landlords who want to change the tenancy arrangements. We must therefore seriously consider the amendments and determine whether they are adequate to protect the rights of tenants and ensure that they are in the same bargaining position as the landlord. Unless there is equality of bargaining, there can be no equality or freedom for a tenant when negotiating with a landlord.

Many prospective tenants face the problem of key money. They might telephone the landlord after seeing an advertisement, be asked to go to see him immediately and then be asked to make an offer on the level of rent that they are prepared to pay and what they are prepared to pay as a deposit and key money. People in desperate circumstances have no choice but to accept whatever the landlord wants. In doing so, they give away their rights to further consideration of the tenancy arrangement. It is important to decide whether the amendment is adequate to deal with that. I do not think that it is.

The Minister of State said in another place:

"We believe that the statutory rent-fixing procedure we have designed will ensure adequate protection for tenants in those situations where it is needed. But we are quite determined that the law should not at any stage get in the way of people who are perfectly capable of sorting matters out between themselves."

How is that to be defined in an area of housing stress? It is a throw-away phrase. The noble Lord continued:

"Where the rent assessment committee determines a rent, that will be the rent payable under the tenancy unless the landlord and tenant agree on a different figure. The tenant cannot be compelled to pay more than the rent assessment committee's determined rent. I repeat . . . there is no X factor."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 3 November 1988; Vol. 501, c. 400.]

In reality, there is an X factor in the market place. It is necessary for people to have roofs over their heads. The landlord makes it clear that either the tenant agrees to a new arrangement or he will not continue the tenancy. With a shorthold assured tenancy, at the end of six months the tenant is on the road with his backpack. He can only hope that the local authority will put him in bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

The throw-away phrases during the debate in another place are meaningless in the battle to help tenants secure their rights in the market place, where the landlord has the ability to determine the rent level. Although the noble Lord's statement was inadequate, at least he attempted to answer the questions put by the Opposition. However, he did not say why the Government had failed to do anything about clause 22(3). Why do not the amendments contain a redefinition of the clause, which states:

"(3) Where an application is made to a rent assessment committee under subsection (1) above with respect to the rent under an assured shorthold tenancy, the committee shall not make such a determination as is referred to in that subsection unless they consider—

(a) that there is a sufficient number of similar dwelling-houses in the locality let on assured tenancies (whether shorthold or not)"?

Who determines what is sufficient in London, in Wigan, in Manchester, in Halifax, in Cardiff——

Mr. Richard Caborn (Sheffield, Central): Or in Sheffield.

Mr. McCartney: I apologise to my hon. Friend for not mentioning Sheffield.

On the one hand, the Minister appears to be giving the tenant the right of redress, but on the other the phraseology he uses in the clause gives the tenant no right of redress whatever if the RAC says that there are not sufficient houses of a similar tenancy to enable it to determine the tenant's application. The tenant will have to pay up or get on his bike and get out.

Clause 22(3)(b) states:

'(b) that the rent payable under the assured shorthold tenancy in question is significantly higher than the rent which the landlord might reasonably be > expected to be able to obtain under the tenancy, having regard to the level of rents payable under the tenancies referred to in paragraph (a) above."

What is the meaning of "significantly higher"? If we are to believe the Minister of State, once the RAC makes a determination, that is the rent. That means that there is an X factor. What is "significantly higher"—£1, £2, £3; 10, 20, 30 or 40 per cent? Is it to be significantly higher than the minimum level of housing benefit set by the local DHSS office?

Who determines that? If a person is homeless in Cardiff or Wigan, he is 100 per cent. homeless. Is it determined in this Bill that in Cardiff a person may be lucky and get the rent assessment committee to assist him, but, unfortunately, in Wigan a person cannot and the answer is to move to Cardiff? That is the sort of double meaning in the legislation.

The legislation gives the illusion that tenants can call their landlords to account and can secure their rights. The ability to negotiate in the market place and to determine both whether the rent level is fair and other tenancy conditions is an illusion. It is an illusion that a tenant can seek redress.

Mr. Redmond: The national mobility scheme, is designed to help people move from one local authority to another. If a person gets on his bike and moves south, obviously becoming part of the homeless sector, he is not allowed to go on to the local authority housing list because he does not have his families, with him. Until he can get his family down south, he cannot go on a waiting list. That happens in authorities which are part of the national mobility scheme, and it is escalating the homeless problem. Can my hon. Friend explain that or will the Minister do so when he replies? Many of my constituents have moved south for a job, which has meant separation from their families with all the hardship, stress and strain that that brings to family life.

Mr. McCartney: I thank my hon. Friend for that point. Coincidentally, I was the member of the Back Bench Opposition team in Committee who was given the dubious pleasure of moving this amendment, which was new clause 36. I do not want to go over old ground, but it may be helpful to the Minister if I give him the short reply given to me by his predecessor. It may assist him to give me an adequate response.

The gist of my argument was that, in the changeover, the national mobility scheme should remain and that arrangements made between inner and outer London boroughs should remain, irrespective of the terms of the tenancy and whether it was in the public or private sector. It was the only occasion when I paid tribute to the Government, and it was for setting up a mobility scheme some years ago. Despite that, the then Minister, who is not present now, said:

> "I have listened carefully to the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney). I understand that the new clause is based on proposals put to the joint committee of the London area mobility scheme, on which the boroughs participating in that committee have not yet reached agreement. So irrespective of its merits or otherwise it is premature, and therefore I resist it.
> I am not inclined to accept the principle behind the new clause. It is preferable that participation in mobility schemes should remain voluntary."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 15 March 1988; c. 1642.]

The market forces apply. That was the short shrift that I got. It is ironic that that was the last time that the Minister spoke from the Dispatch Box, so I suppose that there is some justice in that.

I hope that the Minister can give us some brief indication of the reasoning behind the Government's proposed amendments and why the Government have not included some redefinition of clause 22(3) so that tenants with assured shorthold or assured tenancies can use it for rent levels and other tenancy conditions. Previously, the Minister failed to give a commitment to meet the young homeless in London and elsewhere. I hope that he will not treat this request with the same disdain but that he will get on his hind legs and come to the Dispatch Box. We are awaiting his clarification of the debate in the House of Lords and of this debate.

Mr. Trippier: The speech by the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) was less than worthy of him. I know him well: he is an hon. Member representing the north-west, like myself. Until I heard his speech, I thought highly of him. I always thought that he was an intelligent man, yet he asked why the then Minister for Housing and Planning did not state the Government's position. He was a member of the Committee for a long time, and he would have been present on Report when the Committee proceedings were made clear. If he was not, I should like to know why.

On Report, an undertaking was given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs—my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), who was then Minister for Housing and Planning—that he would concede that the proviso served no useful purpose.

Mr. Battle: The then Minister made promises of concessions in Committee that have not materialised.

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) should consider what he is saying in his interventions. My hon. Friend the then Minister for Housing and Planning was responding to appeals from Labour Members. The hon. Member for Makerfield has not done his homework. He has not even looked at the record of the Report stage or the proceedings that he attended for several months.

Mr. McCartney: I used to think that, as an hon. Member representing the north-west, the Minister was an honourable gentlemen. The Minister is making a patchwork of personal attacks on myself and other Members——

Mr. Boateng: A farrago.

Mr. McCartney: That is the word I wanted. My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) attended a better school than me. I had the benefit of a Scottish education.

The Minister owes the House an explanation of clause 22(3). The then Minister for Housing and Planning said that he would consider the amendment, but if my recollection is correct it did not concern only the specific point made in the House of Lords, which watered down the promise given. Will the Minister please give us an answer?

Mr. Trippier: I shall be happy to give the hon. Gentleman an answer to the specific point that he made about clause 22(1) and 22(3), if he will allow me. The hon. Gentleman knows full well why we conceded this point.

The hon. Member for Makerfield referred to debates in the other place and to the rent regime covering full assured tenancies. We are dealing with shorthold tenancies, under which there is a right to apply at any time, to a rent assessment committee for a rent determination. The rent assessment committee will consider whether the rent payable is above market level, and if it is, it will determine a market rent, which will override the contractual rent. I am sure that I am enlightening the hon. Member for Makerfield—I will give him the benefit of doubt—but this point must have arisen several times in Committee.

Mr. Redmond: It is important to assess the correct level for a rent, but will the Minister consider a method of ensuring that landlords carry out repairs to make a property habitable? When assessing what is fair and reasonable, that must be taken into consideration.

Mr. Trippier: I am sorry that I gave way to the hon. Gentleman, because his comments have nothing to do with the clause. If we were to go down that road, we would have to discuss—we may have time to do so later: for example, on Friday—whether local authorities, not just the private sector, should be made to keep up to date with the repairs for which they are responsible.

The House will know that subsection (3) will still apply —the hon. Member for Makerfield was right—thus the rent assessment committee will be empowered to make a determination of rent only if it considers, first, that there is a sufficient number of similar properties in the locality let on assured tenancies and, secondly, that the rent payable in the case before it is significantly above the rent levels prevailing under those other tenancies.

Mr. Bradley: As a Member representing a north-west constituency, the Minister should understand the position in Manchester. I shall give a practical example of how people accept shorthold tenancies. The Minister should understand the position well because I explained it in Committee. If he had read Hansard, he would have recognised what happens.

People desperate for accommodation race to get the Manchester Evening News and then race to the telephone to try to get an appointment for accommodation. They race to the accommodation and, if they are lucky, they are in a queue of fewer than 20. If they are very lucky, they are at the front of the queue. The landlord offers accommodation on his terms. The applicants cannot determine whether the provisions in the clause about other properties or levels of rent in the area are appropriate and, in desperation, they accept the accommodation. The Minister has said that tenants can go to a rent assessment committee at any stage. If, because of the provisions of the clause, a tenant cannot go to a rent assessment committee to get his rent lowered and cannot afford the rent to which in his desperation he agreed, is evicted by the landlord, will he be considered to be intentionally homeless? I hope that the Minister will reply.

Hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Soley: The Minister does not answer. The problem may be that he is unable to do so. It would help if he could answer the question.

Mr. Trippier: I made that point clear. I shall write to the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley). I would have to examine his precise example.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendment No. 19 agreed to.

Clause 27

DAMAGES FOR UNLAWFUL EVICTION

Lords amendment: No. 20, in page 18, line 35, leave out "20th November 1987" and insert "9th June 1988"

Mr. Trippier: I beg to move, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following Lords amendments: Nos. 21 and 22.

No. 23, in page 19, line 27, leave out

"proceedings are begun to enforce the liability"

and insert

" the date on which proceedings to enforce the liability are finally disposed of"

Amendment (a) thereto, at end insert

'or within the period of six months beginning on the date on which the proceedings are begun, whichever shall be the earlier'.

Lords amendment No. 24.

Lords amendment No. 25, in page 19, line 34, at end insert—

"(6A) If, in proceedings to enforce a liability arising by virtue of subsection (3) above, it appears to the court—

(a) that, prior to the event which gave rise to the liability, the conduct of the former residential occupier or any person living with him in the premises concerned was such that it is reasonable to mitigate the damages for which the landlord in default would otherwise be liable, or

(b) that, before the proceedings were begun, the landlord in default offered to reinstate the former residential occupier in the premises in question and either it was unreasonable of the former residential occupier to refuse that offer or, if he had obtained alternative accommodation before the offer was made, it would have been unreasonable of him to refuse that offer if he had not obtained that accommodation, the court may reduce the amount of damages which would otherwise be payable to such amount as it thinks appropriate."

Amendment (a) thereto, in line 6, leave out 'is reasonable' and insert

'would be wholly unjust not'.

Amendment (b) thereto, in line 10, after 'offered', insert 'in writing'.

Amendment (c) thereto, in line 11, leave out from 'and' to end of line 15 and insert

'it was unreasonable of the former residential occupier to refuse that offer.'.

Lords amendment No. 26.

Lords amendment No. 27, in page 19, line 45, after "for" insert "doing the acts or".

Amendment (a) thereto, in line 1, before 'doing', insert 'with the exception of any grounds for possession under this Act that relate solely to the conduct of the former residential occupier or of any persons living with him in the premises concerned,'.

Lords amendments Nos. 28 to 33, 247, 248 and 269.

Mr. Trippier: All the amendments are concerned with the new civil right to damages created by clause 27, the new offence under the Protection from Eviction Act 1977 which is created by clause 29 and the existing offence. Amendments Nos. 20 and 21 take account of the fact that the clause was widened on Report to cover actions by superior landlords in cases where the landlord knew that the tenant might leave as a result of harassment or persistent withdrawal of services. The amendments provide that the clause shall be effective as from the date of those amendments on Report and not retrospective in the sense in which we would deplore it.

Amendment No. 22 clarifies the meaning of the word "calculated," as used to describe the actions of a landlord who may be liable for damages under this clause. Amendments Nos. 28 and 30 make similar amendments to the existing criminal offence in the Protection from Eviction Act 1977 and the new offence in clause 29. Since this widening of the offence covers both acts of commission and the withholding of services, amendments Nos. 26 and 27 widen the defence provided by clause 27(7)(b). Amendments Nos. 29 to 33 similarly widen the defence provided in clause 29.

9.15 pm

Amendment No. 23 provides that a landlord shall not be liable under clause 27(3) if he reinstates the tenant before proceedings are finally disposed of. Amendments Nos. 247, 248 and 269 make amendments that have a similar effect to the Housing (Scotland) Act 1988.

Opposition amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 23 would make it a requirement that liability under clause 27(3) would arise if the tenant were not reinstated within six months of the date of proceedings starting. The aim of the amendment is to prevent a landlord from dragging out proceedings and thus deterring the tenant from pursuing his case to its conclusion, but there is no need for a time limit in this case. The tenant does not have to accept the landlord's offer to reinstate him. If he accepts an offer before bringing proceedings, he will not get damages under clause 27. If he accepts at any point afterwards, he may not get clause 27 damages but it will still be open to him to bring an action against the landlord for breach of covenant for quiet enjoyment. The longer the landlord spins out the proceedings, the greater the potential loss to him if he loses. If the tenant wins his case, he could also get interest on the damages. It is the tenant's choice whether to accept the landlord's offer of reinstatement, knowing that if he accepts at a late stage in the proceedings he will lose any prospect of clause 27 damages. He gains nothing by the amendment, and I am afraid that I cannot accept it.

Opposition amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 25 wants the wording of amendment No. 25 to specify that the court shall consider mitigating damages only where it would be wholly unjust not to do so. It was the intention of the noble Lords who drew attention to the inability of the court to mitigate damages that damages should be reduced only in exceptional circumstances. The present wording of the amendment employs a well-tried concept —that of reasonableness. It is not necessary to ask the court to decide whether something is manifestly unjust.

The whole thrust of clauses 27 to 29 is against harassment. The clauses introduce a new criminal penalty and swingeing civil penalties. The conduct of a tenant will have to be very bad indeed for a court to decide that it is reasonable to mitigate damages that are clearly designed as a penalty for committing an illegal act. These are not normal compensatory damages; they are penal damages. The court will be aware of that, so I am afraid that I cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. Soley: Does the Minister intend to urge his hon. Friends to ensure that legal aid is available in these cases?

Mr. Trippier: I understand that legal aid is available for all sorts and conditions of men and women.

Mr. Soley: Not so.

Mr. Trippier: Then I shall take advice on that point.

Amendment (b) to Lords amendment No. 25 would make it a requirement that the offer to reinstate a tenant should be made in writing. In practice, written evidence is not necessarily any more valid or compelling than oral evidence. Both can be equally subject to dispute. Any sensible landlord will make any offer in writing, but a tenant can deny that he ever received it. Copies can be forged. The court would still need to make up its mind whether a bona fide offer had been made, taking account of all the circumstances. I am afraid, therefore, that I cannot accept the amendment.

Amendment (c) to Lords amendment No. 25 would remove all the references in amendment No. 25 to the reasonableness of the tenant refusing reinstatement if he had obtained alternative accommodation. The Lords amendment enables the court to consider fully the reasonableness of the tenant refusing an offer of reinstatement.

A landlord should not be liable for extremely heavy damages because his tenant happens to find more congenial alternative accommodation. Amendment No. 25 focuses the court's mind on the reasonableness of a theoretically homeless tenant going back to accommodation from which he has been illegally evicted. Amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 27 seeks to prevent a landlord from claiming that he had reasonable grounds for doing acts or withdrawing services where he had a case for proceeding against the tenant or someone living with him on one of the misconduct grounds.

The amendment is not helpful. The grounds referred to in clause 27(7)(b) are not the statutory grounds for possession in schedule 2, and it is misleading to insert a reference to them as amendment 27(c) does. The subsection as amended enables a landlord to offer a defence that he had reasonable grounds for some act he had committed, which caused the occupier to leave the premises or otherwise interfered with his enjoyment of them. Misconduct by the tenant which provoked him to a particular act might or might not be considered by the courts to be reasonable grounds for that act. The courts will of course always be aware that illegal eviction and the withholding or withdrawing of services can be criminal offences, and that the proper way in which to obtain possession is through the courts, and will have that in mind in assessing any situation. There is no case for an amendment on the lines of amendment (a), and I am afraid I cannot accept it.

Mr. Boateng: The manner in which the Under-Secretary of State dismissed the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) about the availability of legal aid to people who complain of harassment by their landlords will have caused a great deal of anxiety among those of us who advise and assist the victims of such harassment. It will cause even more concern to the victims of harassment. I urge the Minister to take immediate advice before the debate on this amendment closes.

The idea that legal aid is readily available in cases such as these—to all manner and classes of person, as the Minister describes them—is absolute nonsense, and I choose my words advisedly. One of the major causes of concern to practitioners of all party political persuasions about the resourcing and administration of the legal aid scheme is precisely that there are groups of people of relatively modest means and people who have little or no income but must rely on savings who are excluded from legal aid because of the civil legal aid regulations. It is not good enough for Conservative Members to say that that is not true, as those of us who spent many hours considering the Legal Aid Bill in Committee expressed our concern over that. There is no room for complacency.

Mr. Trippier rose——

Mr. Boateng: I see that the Under-Secretary of State is champing at the bit. I am happy to give way, in the hope that he may be able to give some reassurance to those of us who follow these issues carefully.

Mr. Trippier: I have taken the hon. Gentleman's advice and taken legal advice as quickly as possible. The hon. Gentleman is in danger of misleading hon. Members by suggesting that changes to legal aid are affected by what we are talking about. I am not sure that what the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) said is on the record, as it was semi sotto voce, but he was speaking of cases of this kind. My understanding was that he was talking about housing matters and said that legal aid was being withdrawn in housing matters. That is not the case. I am sorry, but there appears to be a dispute between the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) and the hon. Member for Hammersmith.

Mr. Boateng: My hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith will make himself clear.

Mr. Soley: The Government's proposals for legal aid, which they are changing, will make people less eligible for legal aid, and in some cases, people who would have got legal aid will not get it in future.

Mr. Boateng: That is the point. Nothing that the Minister said in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith gives any comfort when it comes to the availability of legal aid for the victims of harassment. That is because of the changes in the regulations pursuant to the Legal Aid Act 1988 and changes in the quantum of damages, the likely remedy available to those who allege harassment and their chances of success. Those who apply for legal aid in cases of alleged harassment by landlords do not stand the sort of chance that they should have of receiving legal advice and the assistance that they so desperately need. It is on these issues that we seek clarification from the Minister. When he reflects upon them in the fullness of time, he may return with a more considered and reassuring response.

I shall reflect generally on the impact of the amendments on the mischief that is recognised by hon. Members on both sides of the House. There are several ingredients that would feature in an effective law against harassment. Central to these is the likelihood of the landlord who is determined to ride roughshod over the rights of the individual tenant not being in any way facilitated by the processes of the court. The issues that we seek to address in considering the amendments go precisely to that point.

We are anxious to ensure that landlords do not drag out proceedings in a way that is beneficial to their purposes. We are anxious, too, to ensure that the quantum of damages will act as a real deterrent to the landlord who is determined to make a quick buck by inflicting hardship and suffering on the tenant and excluding him or her from the premises. I am talking of the landlord who will be prepared to winkle out a tenant by putting him or her at a disadvantage in terms of occupancy of the premises.

We are concerned to ensure that nothing gives the impression to the landlord that he stands to gain anything by going to court and telling a pack of lies. Experience shows those who have had anything to do with advising professionally, whether they be citizens' advice bureau workers, lawyers, or tenancy relations officers, that when a landlord will benefit from lying, he will lie shamelessly and blatantly to maximise the opportunity for profit. Our concern is that he should be deterred from so doing. If he believes that he can minimise his loss by making allegations about the conduct of the tenant, he will do so. The amendment seeks to ensure that that will not substantially reduce damages.

If he can say that he has given notice and has made an offer to a tenant of reasonable alternative accommodation when he has not, and he is not required to show that he has made that offer in writing, he will do so. That is why we require the individual to make the offer in writing. Then it is there in black and white. It is that sort of amendment that gives the tenant and those who advise him the certainty that he does not simply have rights on paper but remedies in reality. When one talks of harassment in the real world, a right without remedy is meaningless when it comes to seeking to achieve a particular purpose.

9.30 pm

Mr. McCartney: Recently in my constituency, a landlord offered tenancies to two young women and said that dogs, other animals or children were not allowed. Subsequently, one of the women became pregnant. The landlord attempted to remove her from the tenancy on the basis that he and his solicitor wrote saying that she had broken the terms of the tenancy by becoming pregnant and so should remove herself forthwith from the premises. That has happened. Given what my hon. Friend has just said about the right of access to legal assessment, will the amendment help such a tenant?

Mr. Boateng: The Opposition's amendment would at least give such an individual a greater sense of security and certainty that there would be an effective remedy; that there would be an appropriate quantum of damages if the case were made out; and that there would be a greater and more stringent test that the landlord would be obliged to fulfil than is currently the case. That is self-evident on the face of the amendment.

However, one must recognise the market context into which the amendments fall in which there will be every economic incentive for the landlord to get the tenant out, come hell or high water. The great danger of the path down which the Government have sought to go in this area of housing; their reliance on the private market; their obeisance to the mythology that somehow the private sector and resources within it will free accommodation into the housing market, is that even with the safeguards, even as we seek to amend the Bill, there will not be sufficient protection for the individual tenant..

That is why, when this matter was considered in the other place, time and again noble Lords on both sides and on no side sought reassurances from the Minister of State. We say that the reassurances that they gleaned are inadequate and need to be supplemented in the way that we seek tonight.

Mr. Winnick: Is not one of the dangers that landlords with regulated tenants feel that they are being discriminated against? Clearly, if the letting occurred once the Housing Bill becomes an Act, market rents would be the order of the day. Therefore, those landlords and property companies with existing tenants will ask why they should continue to be discriminated against by their tenants not being forced to pay the full whack.

Rachmanism emerged at the time of the 1957 Rent Act and the great danger is that the gangster element in the private sector—I hope that most landlords will not use such methods—will use any means to get a tenant out and not be particularly concerned about a fine, because once a tenant is out he will have achieved his objective.

Mr. Boateng: Of course that is so. Under this legislation, the pressure will be on to get the old tenant out and a new tenant in under the new arrangements. Once that is done, the landlord can charge what he likes and get the tenant out whenever he wants. That is the whole philosophy behind this Bill.

I am anxious that the Minister should respond, amendment by amendment, to our arguments. I begin with Lords amendment No. 23, the purpose of which is to prevent a landlord from dragging out proceedings brought by a tenant under clause 27 with the aim of discouraging a tenant's claim for compensation. In other words, the landlord might otherwise deter a tenant from bringing the matter to trial by dragging out the proceedings for as long as he could. Under clause 27 as drafted, a landlord could avoid liability either by reinstating the tenant before proceedings begin or by observing a court order that the tenant be reinstated.

On Report in the House of Lords, a Government amendment was accepted allowing the landlord to avoid liability by reinstating his tenant at any time prior to the completion of the court case. However, that claim is wide open to abuse by landlords. The Under-Secretary of State and those who advise him must surely appreciate that all too often, a tenant will be unable to secure a court order for reinstatement. One of the most common tricks—it is one that predates Rachman—is that the landlord relets the property. He will then have every incentive to spin out the proceedings, expecting that the original tenant will give up his case.

Those of us who have been in legal practice—there are practitioners in all parts of the House—know that to be so. We have been party to such attempts and have sought to negate them when they impact adversely on our clients. However, the fact remains that many tenants will give up. The point rightly made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith, and dismissed so disparagingly by the Minister, was that under new legal aid regulations, the plaintiff in such a case will have to make his legal aid contributions as long as the case continues.

It must be clear even to the Minister that there is a positive advantage to the landlord in spinning out court proceedings, knowing that the longer will be the period in which the tenant must continue making legal aid contributions. Not only will the tenant be without a home, but he or she will be paying for being homeless. It may or may not be the case ultimately that the tenant concerned will get his money back—but he will have to take that risk. That will cause many tenants to give up.

Mr. Soley: My understanding is that, if the landlord makes an offer to reinstate the tenant towards the end of a court case, the proceedings will stop—but that, if afterwards the landlord again takes steps to get rid of the same tenant, that tenant will have to start proceedings all over again.

Mr. Boateng: That is the horror of the situation, and we hope that the Minister will respond. We are making these points not for the sake of doing so, but because we are anxious for clarification. We do not want to believe that such may be the case, but all the evidence from the plain words of the Bill, and from our experience of such cases, is that that is what will happen. In the case that I described, only in the unlikely event that the tenant pursues his case to its conclusion, which could take several years, will the landlord have to decide between reinstating that tenant or paying compensation under clause 27.

Although, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith has said, the last-minute reinstatement of the tenant will not enable the landlord to avoid liability for ordinary compensatory or exemplary damages—unless the tenant gives up that claim as well—the amount of such damages is usually far lower than the gain to the landlord from illegally evicting. That is why clause 27 is in the Bill. Its deterrent effect will be substantially reduced, because any unscrupulous landlord—in fact, any landlord determined to maximise the value of his property—is bound to use the "wait and see" tactic.

Mr. Winnick: It is interesting to note that, on Second Reading, the Secretary of State said in reply to an intervention of mine about the strong possibility of a repeat of Rachmanism that one of the changes from the Rent Act 1957 was that powers were being taken against unscrupulous landlords. Do not the Government anticipate a number of Rachmans, Bergers and Hoogstratens who will use every means possible to try to get out tenants who are at present protected by law? They will have every incentive to do so, because lettings will then be subject to market rents and tenants will have to pay far more than they do now.

Mr. Boateng: During the various stages of consideration of the Bill in another place, the Minister of State was quite candid. He said, as we do, that while the Hoogstratens of this world were not necessarily typical of all landlords—mercifully—the pressure would nevertheless be there. As long as the pressure is there, we have a responsibility, here and in the other place, to get the matter right. We say that the other place did not get it right, and we want to know how we can try to get it right now.

Dragging the case out would not necessarily lead to any increase in the amount of ordinary damages. [Interruption.] I hear an hon. Member, from a sedentary position—[HON. MEMBERS: "It is the same one."] It is the hon. Member for Wirral, South (Mr. Porter) again. He is accusing us of dragging out this debate. Let me tell him that we will drag it out for as long as it takes to protect those in this city and elsewhere who, day in, day out, live in fear of the sort of landlord whom we have a duty to deter. We will do it if it takes all night. This is not a cause for ironical cheers or hand clapping on the part of the hon. Member for Wirral, South. He does no credit to himself or his party by acting in that way. Many Conservative Members take this matter seriously. I hope that the Minister takes it seriously, because we certainly do, and we intend to persist with it.

It does not seem unreasonable to want the purported purpose of the amendment made into a reality. We do not want the position that we fear would result if the amendment were carried in its current form, in which the landlord would be given a last chance to reconsider his position in the light of the possible salutory effect of court proceedings. Nor do we believe that our requirement would be met by giving the landlord a limited time after court proceedings have begun in which to reinstate the tenant. In practice very few landlords will be able and willing to reinstate the tenant more than six months after proceedings start. That is how it will be in the real world. In order to protect the tenant and create a climate in which responsible landlordism is encouraged and to provide a context in which the Hoogsbratens of this world and others of that kind are discouraged it is necessary that our amendment to Lords amendment No. 23 is accepted.

9.45 pm

Amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 25 is a short amendment in which we seek simply to leave out the words, "is reasonable" from clause 5 and insert in their place

"would be wholly unjust not".

Again, the reason for that has its heart in our wish to make sure that everything possible is done to reduce the opportunity for misconduct on the part of the landlord. As the Bill was originally drafted, the court had no power to reduce compensation for alleged misconduct by the tenant. Under the Bill as amended, the court can reduce the amount of compensation by such an amount as it considers appropriate if the conduct of the tenant or any person living with him makes it reasonable to do so.

In Committee, the Earl of Caithness, speaking on behalf of the Government, rejected amendments that would give the court a wide discretion as to how much compensation to award for illegal eviction and harassment. We agree with him in saying:

"We want the courts to award damages which fully compensate the tenant, not to be able to reduce the sum to a point where every landlord can afford to harass, knowing that the gain he makes from his illegal action will outweigh the penalty imposed by the courts."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 25 July 1988; Vol. 500, c. 94-5.]

The noble Lord Jenkins took the view that full compensation should be awarded save

"in wholly exceptional circumstances"

or

"if the damages as assessed under Clause 18 are manifestly unjust in all the circumstances of the case."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 25 July 1988; Vol. 500, c. 93.]

On Report, the Minister of State pointed out:

"If the discretion given to the court is too wide, we suspect that damages awarded are likely to continue at present levels which often bear relationship to the tenant's loss."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 24 October 1988; Vol. 500, c. 1420.]

The noble Lord was recognising a factor with which many of us have had to deal in constituency cases. There are the most horrific examples of bad landlords. Even though the tenant has proved his case with the assistance of the tenancy relations officer—we know how hard that that can be and how difficult the evidential burden is—even though the tenant has gone through all the hoops, the amount awarded is almost derisory in terms of its relationship to the loss, hardship, suffering, mental torment and anguish undergone by the tenant.

We find it difficult and unacceptable that the Bill as amended does not achieve what the noble Lord wanted it to achieve, in that the court will still able to exercise a wide discretion, so wide as to render nugatory the aims and objectives of the Minister of State, which we entirely accept.

There is no definition of when it is reasonable to reduce compenstion for misconduct, or by how much it should be reduced. The result of that will be that landlords will be encouraged to raise false allegations of misconduct—a fear that we expressed earlier—in the hope of reducing compensation to a lower level than their gain from the eviction, so weakening the deterrent effect of clause 27 which we are anxious to see strengthened. It would also be open to the court to reduce compensation for trivial or isolated acts of misconduct. The amendment seeks to make it clear that such a reduction should be made only in exceptional circumstances when it would be wholly unfair not to do so.

The power remains with the court. The avenues by which to arrive at a just decision are not open to it. There are precedents in the wording of statutes for saying that this power should be exercised only in exceptional circumstances in which it would be wholly unfair not to exercise it. So the emphasis is on deterrence and on protecting the tenant—that is what we are trying to do. That is what all reasonable people should try to do, recognising the pressure that will be on the tenant.

The pressures have already begun to show themselves. My hon. Friends will know from their work and from messages that they receive from advice centres, law centres and local law societies the extent to which, in anticipation of the Bill and the largesse that it will make available to landlords, the winkling has already begun.

Amendment (b) to Lords amendment No. 25 is designed to ensure that an offer of reinstatement is given in writing: that is only fair. Lords amendment No. 25 gives the court the power to reduce the amount of compensation that the tenant would otherwise receive if it appeared to the court that before the proceedings began the landlord offered to reinstate the tenant and that offer was unreasonably refused.

Mr. Winnick: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the fallacies in the Government's thinking is the belief that the tenant and the landlord are equal parties to an agreement and that no outsider need therefore intervene when a deal is negotiated? That is sheer madness in places where there is an acute housing shortage, and where landlords have all the power and prospective tenants have none.

This Bill would merely reinforce landlords' power. We recognise that some of them abide by the law—all the same, it has been tilted in their favour—but unscrupulous landlords will consider themselves mugs if they do not take all possible steps, legal or otherwise, to get tenants out. I see the Minister shaking his head, but why on earth should not unscrupulous landlords do their utmost to get tenants out? That makes all the sense in the world. Once the tenants are out, the landlords can do what they like with the, accommodation—let it at market rents, for instance.

Does my hon. Friend agree that his proposal is the minimum required? If the Government do not accept it they are clearly indifferent to what will happen—my hon. Friend has said that it is already happening. Tenants will be pressurised and harassed.

Mr. Boateng: I entirely accept that, and I welcome my hon. Friend's intervention. There is nothing onerous or unreasonable about requiring a landlord who claims that he has offered to reinstate a tenant and who has received an unreasonable refusal to give evidence of that offer in writing. We have yet to hear any reasoned objection to that proposal from the Government. What can be wrong with asking a landlord who says that his offer was unreasonably rejected for written evidence of his offer? One of the ways in which the courts have traditionally attempted to balance the unequal relationship between landlord and tenant has been to require, if not written evidence, at least something that shows the existence of an agreement which can be of value to, and can be taken into account by, the courts.

In such circumstances, what could be more reasonable than saying that the whole agreement need not be in writing but that if a landlord seeks to rely on a tenant's unreasonable refusal of his offer, he must show that that offer was made in writing? Otherwise, landlords will have every reason to maintain falsely that they made an offer, on the offchance that the judge will believe them. That sometimes happens. Some people are accomplished liars and it is not always possible for the courts to detect such persons, although mercifully they often do; one has a certain feel for such matters. It is not unreasonable to make such a requirement and so deter those who seek to reduce compensation and waste the court's time by laying a false trail. The Minister has given no satisfactory explanation as to why the amendment should be rejected.

Amendment No. 25 requires the court to determine whether it was unreasonable of a former residential occupier to refuse the offer. Clause 27(6)(a) gives the court the power to reduce the amount of compensation that the tenant would otherwise receive if it appears that, prior to the proceedings beginning, the landlord has offered to reinstate the tenant and that offer has been unreasonably refused. Under the Bill as drafted, the court cannot take into accounts in deciding whether a refusal of an offer to reinstate is unreasonable, the fact that the tenant may have obtained alternative accommodation, however well settled the tenant may have become.

Suppose that a tenant has been pushed out of his home in horrendous circumstances. Having gone through what can be an extremely traumatic experience, the natural thing for him to do is to put down roots as quickly as he can in his new abode. We say that it is wrong that the courts should not be able to take that into account when determining whether the residential occupier unreasonably refused the offer of reinstatement. It is a simple amendment strengthening the hands of the court in arriving at a just decision.

The Opposition have tabled a bundle of amendments seeking to remedy the fact that the protection given is insufficient for the purposes set out in the Bill. We seek to protect the tenant from the harassment that will result from the Bill and to give the courts the powers and discretion to exercise their function in a just way and allow them to establish the true relationship between landlord and tenant rather than to allow the landlords deliberately to obscure the truth.

We commend the amendments to the House in the context of a Bill that has already had a marked impact on the incidence of harassment in our constituencies. It is not good enough for Ministers in this House or in another place to tell us that we have no need to fear because everything will be all right and that the provisions are the best that can possibly be arrived at. That reassurance will fall on deaf ears in terms of those at the cutting edge of the housing crisis and the current spate of speculation in housing.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Lords Amendments to the Housing Bill, and the Lords Amendments to the School Boards (Scotland) Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Maclean.]

Housing Bill

Lords amendments again considered.

Question again proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.

Mr. Boateng: It is like the scene in "The Devil's Triangle" in which the sea captain throws a lifejacket to a drowning man as the sharks begin to circle and at the same time throws in a bucket or two or offal. Nothing is more certain to attract the speculative sharks infesting the landlord and tenant sea than the smell of blood. This legislation has given them the smell of blood. We seek to substitute a raft for the lifejacket. That is all that we seek to do, but we commend it to the House.

Mr. Soley: My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) has adequately explained the problem. I shall not delay the House long, as we need to vote on this important matter.

The Government have based the legislation on the belief that they could revive the rented sector. To try to protect themselves from the charge of Rachmanism, which has given them so many problems in the past, they claim to have put in strong safeguards against harassment. We argued throughout the Committee stage that that was not so and we believe that we have proved the point.

Here, I pray in aid one whom I would not normally wish to have on my side—Mr. Hoogstraten, who, in the famous "World in Action" programme, said that he regarded the Bill as a step in the right direction. When I wrote to the then Minister pointing that out, he replied that he did not think that Mr. Hoogstraten understood the Bill. I believe that Mr. Hoogstraten understands the Bill very well, and I assure the House that his solicitors understand it perfectly. As a result of this legislation, they will be able to get evictions far more easily than ever before. With an assured tenancy, all they have to do is to tell the tenant that they intend to carry out major works. They can then get an eviction just like that—no court case, nothing.

The Minister intervened on my point about legal aid. Some Conservative Members believe that the relationship between landlord and tenant should be a simple legal relationship and that, if either side feels that the other is not acting according to the contract, they should go to law. My point to the Minister was that legal aid would not be available in all such cases, particularly in view of the impending changes, and that in many cases the person would not even get to a solicitor in the first place. The Government do not begin to understand how serious that is, nor how varied are the practices involved.

I cite just one example—a constituent of mine who describes himself as well placed to look after himself, well educated, and so on. In that instance, the absentee landlord deliberately failed to pay the mortgage, thus inciting the mortgage company to foreclosure and eviction. The landlords sent messages to the mortgage company indicating that they knew that the bailiffs would be calling and did not intend to oppose any eviction—all the while concealing the fact that there was a protected tenant in occupation of the premises.

My constituent states:

"It was only by luck that I was at home when the mortgage company's agent arrived which allowed me and my solicitor to negotiate a way out of this situation by informing the mortgage company that I was in situ."

That man was paying a rent of about £480 a month, he was represented by a solicitor and he was well able to speak for himself. Despite that, he was advised that it was becoming increasingly common for a landlord deliberately to foreclose on a mortgage and set up an illegal eviction by keeping quiet about the existence of a tenant. Once that luckless tenant is out on the street, the landlord steps forward and pays the mortgage arrears to the mortgage company, thereby re-establishing himself with full control over the premises, having successfully short-circuited all protection given by the law to the tenant.

If the Government were genuinely concerned about dealing with eviction, they would give local authorities, tenancy relations officers, law centres or some other group in society the power to act on behalf of individuals. They have not done so. Indeed, they are taking away those powers and there will be an increase in the number of evictions. The majority of landlords are very good and have good relationships with their tenants, but there is a large minority of bad landlords. The Government have the cheek to criticise some local authorities that may be bad managers, but they never seem to worry about the Hoogstratens and Rachmans of the world. That is a damaging indictment.

It is a fact of life that such people exist and we know that those who will be most at risk are generally the disadvantaged—those least able to speak for themselves or to put their case to a lawyer. We urge the Government, even at this late stage, to accept what we believe their Lordships intended, which was to tighten the law relating to the Rachmans and Hoogstratens. I believe that eventually the Government will have to go even further, because if they do not, in years to come there will be hideous stories of abuse by individual landlords against tenants who cannot stand up to them in a court of law because they will have neither the resources nor the ability to do so. That is the problem, and that is why we shall vote against the Government.

Mr. Speaker: I shall put the Question on Lords amendment No. 20.

Mr. Soley: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understood that the Government were intending to reject the amendments. We certainly wish to vote against Lords amendments Nos. 22, 23 and 24.

Mr. Speaker: I have received no such indication.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments Nos. 21, 22 and 23 agreed to.

Lords amendment: No. 24, in page 19, line 34, at end insert—

"and for the purposes of paragraph (a) above, proceedings to enforce a liability are finally disposed of on the earliest date by which the proceedings (including any proceedings on or in consequence of an appeal) have been determined and any time for appealing or further appealing has expired, except that if any appeal is abandoned, the proceedings shall be taken to be disposed of on the date of the abandonment"

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Trippier.]

Question accordingly agreed to.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Can you confirm that the decision on the procedure that you adopted immediately before the last vote was exactly the same as that adopted at 9.51 pm last night before Division No. 478?

Mr. Speaker: I was not present at 9.57 last night. There was some slight confusion, but I think that we got it right in the end.

Lords amendments Nos. 25 to 33 agreed to.

Clause 31

EXCLUDED TENANCIES AND LICENCES

Lords amendment No. 34, in page 23, line 34, after "if" insert "(a)".

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Ridley.]

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to discuss Lords amendments Nos. 35 and 36.

Mr. McCartney: I wish to speak to amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 35. It is important to describe the background to rural deprivation. We have concentrated in this debate on inner-city deprivation—[Interruption.]

Mr. Boateng: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. A number of hon. Members are trying to listen to my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney), but it is very difficult to do so because of the off-noises on the other side of the Bar.

Mr. Speaker: I understand. Will those hon. Members who are not in the House but beyond the Bar kindly leave the Chamber and carry on their conversations elsewhere or come into the Chamber and listen to the debate?

Mr. McCartney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your protection.

Before I was so rudely interrupted, I was about to say that so far in this debate we have concentrated on inner-city deprivation, the role of the private sector in the housing market and the lack of resources allocated to public sector housing. In this amendment, we concentrate on the rural poor and the housing crisis in rural England, Wales and Scotland.

In 1981, the Department of the Environment asked Mr. Brian McLaughlin to prepare a report on rural poverty among low-paid workers, in particular among agricultural workers and those who live in villages and hamlets. The report was so devastating in its criticism of Government policy that it was not published by the Department until 1986. It is known as the deprivation of rural areas report and it highlighted major social problems. It revealed that 25 per cent. of households in rural England live on the poverty line.

The gap between rich and poor in rural areas is widening. It has been especially noticeable since 1985. Nationally, about 11 per cent. of all households have a gross disposable income of at least three times that of those on supplementary benefit. In rural England, the figure is 26 per cent., so a minority—the rural poor—are living among many affluent people. [Interruption.] From a sedentary position, the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) is interrupting. If he is so knowledgeable about the problems of the rural poor, he should get to his feet and make a contribution to the debate. If not, he should be quiet.

For the last 12 months, Opposition Members have been attempting to improve the Bill to benefit the rural poor, but—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

10.30 pm

Mr. McCartney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Just under 7 per cent. of houses in rural areas are unfit for human habitation. That appalling figure is higher than in most urban areas in Britain. There is a shortage of housing for the poor working classes in rural areas—agricultural workers, retired agricultural workers, the semi-skilled and the unskilled. Many people have been forgotten in the surge to improve rural housing. People indigenous to the rural community have been forgotton in the headlong rush of people moving out from urban areas, who have taken much of the refurbished housing stock at the expense of local people. Add to that reductions in rate support grant to rural district councils and county councils, and we find that a continuing financial and social problem afflicts many rural communities. There have been changes in housing benefit, and the safety net of inadequate public sector housing provision cannot deal with the mounting problems of homelessness.

Despite their inactivity of the past few years, the Government were moved this summer to consider the problem of the rural economy and rural housing. This month, in Rural Housing, David Clark wrote in an article entitled "Countryside homes":

> "There is a real housing need in villages. Local people simply cannot compete on equal terms with the increasing numbers of more affluent incomers, whether they be commuters, retired or second homers. That comes through strongly in the recent reports from the Association of District Councils, and from the village appraisals and housing surveys produced by parish councils and rural community councils throughout the country, summarised in ACRE's new publication, Affordable homes in the countryside.

That independent assessment tells the Government clearly that the crisis in rural housing is continuing apace.

In response, the Government published on 5 July the White Paper dealing with housing in rural areas, which relies heavily on the role of the private sector. The Minister will have to explain the consequences of his policies on security of tenure for private sector tenants in rural areas. Paragraph 13 of the Government's response says of the private sector:

"The Government is keen to establish a greater choice in the provision of rented housing in rural areas as elsewhere. Housing associations should not become the monopolists of the future. Private sector landlords and developers also have an important role to play. In the past the problem has been that the private sector did not envisage being able to make a sufficient return through the provision of lower cost housing at prices that local people could afford. In the rented sector the Government has launched several important measures to encourage investment. First, the Housing Bill will remove statutory rent control from all new lettings. Landlords will be able to charge market rents while tenants will have long term security under assured tenancies and a minimum of six months security on a short hold tenancy. Second, the Business Expansion Scheme is to be extended for the period up to the end of 1993 to cover companies providing housing let on the new assured tenancies."

That is how the Government envisage the private sector intervening in rural areas.

There is continuing pressure on the market in rural areas, but the ability of agricultural workers, retired agricultural workers and private tenants to affect that market is almost non-existent. It is nearly impossible for them to get a house to rent at a proper rent. It is virtually impossible for the rural poor to enter even the lower end of the house buyers' market. The average price of a house in East Anglia now exceeds £35,000.

Those who operate in the private sector will make substantial profits as they increase rent levels and see their property investments increase in value during a housing crisis. The amendment is an attempt to ensure that those living in private rented accommodation retain their existing rights and will not be subject to eviction by their employers without a court order.

The Government made it clear in the document that they produced in July on the housing crisis in rural areas that they would provide substantial opportunities for farmers and owners of accommodation in farming areas to take advantage of the business expansion scheme and other schemes and to utilise their accommodation by increasing their income from rents and by making sales on the open market. It is important that the Minister gives the House assurances that bear on the Rent (Agriculture) Act 1976, including the rights within that measure of agricultural workers.

In another place, an amendment was introduced by the Government to extend the range of excluded tenancies and licences to include those whose tenancy or licence was granted otherwise than for money or money's worth. The Earl of Arran said that the aim of the amendment was to allow eviction without a court order of the non-paying guest who lives completely rent-free. The relevant passage can be found in the House of Lords Hansard, at column 406 on 3 November 1988.

The amendment was tabled as a consequence of a commitment that was given to Lord Meston on Report. It catches the non-paying guest who lives in accommodation rent free, but it may exclude from protection from eviction employees who live in tied accommodation rent-free. For example, an employee may have a contract that states that his accommodation will be provided rent-free. He will not be able to point to an agreement that shows that he is getting accommodation in return for money or services. The courts may find that such a person is excluded from protection, which may result in him being evicted without a court order being made. That is unacceptable, and I do not believe that that was the intention behind the amendment moved in another place. I hope that the Secretary of State or the Under-Secretary of State will give us that assurance.

A non-paying guest is not in the same position as an agricultural worker or retired agricultural worker. Unscrupulous property owners, absentee farmers or working farmers should not be able to use the amendment that was moved in another place to remove tenants and obtain capital gains at their expense. I hope that we shall receive a clear sign that it is the Government's intention to protect tenants who come within the terms of the 1976 Act.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): As a former farm manager who had some responsibility for farm workers' housing including tied cottages, I believe that there is a housing crisis in the countryside. Many tied cottages have become extremely valuable to the owners because there is no real alternative accommodation. Owners want agricultural workers to get out of their houses so that they can put them on to the housing market in rural areas.

When an agricultural worker takes a job, he will normally sign a contract of employment. Provision is often made in a contract for the worker to live in property that is owned by the farmer or landowner. I do not want agricultural workers to have less security of tenure than they enjoy now. In days gone by, many enlightened landlords ensured that the widows of farm workers who had perhaps worked on an estate or large farm for 30 or 40 years or more could remain in their cottages for the rest of their lives.

We are dealing with relatively low-paid workers and, because of the reduction in local authority housing stock as a result of the right-to-buy legislation, particularly in rural areas, there is often no alternative accommodation for farm workers who have lost the tenancies of tied cottages. Will the Secretary of State assure us that farm workers will be given the opportunity to remain within the tenancy until they can find an alternative tenancy in the locality?

In days gone by, when tenants of tied cottages changed their jobs, there was always local authority housing. Such opportunities no longer exist, yet it is important that such a tenant moves on because another farm worker may well need the house. The lack of alternative housing creates a serious situation for the agricultural worker and his family. I hope that the Secretary of State will say what security such tenants will have.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) for drawing attention to the importance of rural housing in England. I hope that my hon. Friend, who I know is proud of his English constituency, will not object to me, a Scot representing a Scottish constituency, taking part in this important debate on rural housing in England and Wales. After all, I live close to the English border. Indeed, I can see a number of rural houses in north Northumberland from my house.

I was particularly interested to hear my hon. Friend refer to the Rent (Agriculture) Act 1976 which was enacted under the previous Labour Government when my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, East (Mr. Strang) was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. Happily, he was able to steer that important piece of legislation through Parliament, affording some protection to tenants in tied housing in England and Wales.

The sad irony is that that Labour Government were not able to put similar legislation on the statute book for Scotland. My hon. Friend was able to protect farm workers in England and Wales, but in Scotland farm workers still have to cope with the old oppressive tied housing system, under which it is all too easy for tenants and their families to be evicted.

I am disturbed to hear that the amendment could undermine the protection that has been made available for tenants of tied housing in England and Wales. The 1976 Act was an important development in respect of such employees. It was said in another place that this provision was intended to deal with the problem of non-paying guests in farm cottages. Given the terms of contract to which the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) referred, a high proportion of farm workers could be described as non-paying guests in the sense that they do not pay rent—but they give something in lieu of rent, by selling their labour very cheaply.

The agricultural wages boards set wages far too low, and all too many farmers, in England and Wales as well as in Scotland, pay only the basic wage. Their employees are provided with "free" accommodation as a perk, if it may be so described. It is often not really free, because the employees often pay dearly for what is often very bad accommodation by selling their labour far too cheaply. It is both offensive and misleading to suggest that such tenants are non-paying guests. They pay through the nose, or, more appropriately, by the sweat of their brows. Easing the eviction of tenants and their families in those circumstances would be an intolerable step for the House to sanction.

A further problem will face the tenants of tied accommodation who work in farming and in other industries, with the introduction in Scotland of the poll tax in April. Hitherto, employers have paid the rates due on tied accommodation on behalf of their employees. In future, there will be a tax on the occupiers rather than on the property. There is no guarantee that tenants will have any more in their wage packets, yet they will suddenly find themselves having to pay the poll tax, while the farmer no longer has to pay any rates. The farmer will end up better off while his employees will be worse off.

I am profoundly disturbed that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Makerfield said, this provision could represent another retrograde step by the Government and undermine the already weak position of farm workers in rural areas. My hon. Friend was right to draw attention to several disturbing aspects of rural poverty and housing pressure in England and Wales, and I hope that the House will give them serious consideration.

Mr. Alan Roberts: Phrases such as "wicked Tory Government" trip off the lips very easily, but we believe that in this instance the Government may be mistaken in introducing legislation based on the concept of someone having a bare licence—for example, for putting up a friend who sleeps on the floor and where no money changes hands. However, this provision inadvertently applies also to tied tenants, and particularly to those in rural areas. We hope that the Government will consider all the points that have been made by my hon. Friends and by others in respect of this proposal and the related Lords amendments.

My hon. Friends have made it clear that they are very concerned about housing problems in rural areas, about tied tenants, and about the homelessness that will be created as a result of this Bill. It will be difficult for those affected to be rehoused—especially since the supply of public sector accommodation has dried up under the right-to-buy provisions. Rural property acquired under that legislation has not been replaced by either the public or private sector, and considerable housing stress and poverty now exists.

That is true not just of inner city constituency such as that which I represent. The local authority area of Sefton in which my constituency is situated embraces many rural as well as city areas, and as a consequence I am approached with problems by people from the rural parts of Sefton which I pass on to my hon. Friend the Member for Crosby (Mr. Thornton) and the hon. Member for Southport (Mr. Fearn). I hope that the Secretary of State will take on board our genuine concern and will respond by accepting our proposals.

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): I congratulate Opposition Members on taking us for a delightful rural ride. We have been over the questions of the community charge, rural poverty and many other aspects of an important problem concerning rural housing, which I found fascinating to listen to. We were given the view from Brecon Beacons, the view of the Cheviot hills from East Lothian, and even the view of rural Sefton, which was a touching picture.

I have to say, however, that these attempts to spin out debate are not relevant to the amendment. The amendment is entirely concerned with whether those who pay no rent—I emphasise the words "no rent"—should be enabled to be got rid of without a court order. The reason for the amendment was correctly described by the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) as being not to apply court order powers to non-paying guests. From that it was deduced that there must be many others who paid no rent to whom it would apply. I am delighted to tell hon. Members that tenants under the Rent (Agriculture) Act 1976 will not be affected by the amendment; nor will assured agricultural occupants, under the Bill. The whole agricultural sector is not affected by the amendment. I can therefore give hon. Members the assurances that they seek.

Question put and agreed to.

Lords amendments 34 to 36 agreed to.

Clause 34

NEW PROTECTED TENANCIES AND AGRICULTURAL OCCUPANCIES RESTRICTED TO SPECIAL CASES

Lords amendment: No. 37 in page 25, line 50, after "court" insert

"considered that, in the circumstances, the grant of an assured tenancy would not afford the required security and, accordingly".

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said amendment.—[Mr. Ridley.]

Mr. Speaker: With this we may take Lords amendments Nos. 38 to 44 and amendment (a) thereto.

Mr. Tony Banks: I beg to move, as an amendment to the Lords amendment (a), in line 2, leave out

'would not afford the required security'

and insert

'shall not be treated as affording the required security by reason only of the fact that the tenancy is an assured tenancy within the meaning of the Housing Act 1988'.

These amendments relate to clause 34, which is the first clause in chapter V of part I of the Bill.

Mr. Ridley: Lords amendments Nos. 37 and 42 deal with cases in which a landlord is seeking possession of his property on one of the grounds involving the provision of suitable alternative accommodation and the court directs that the tenancy of that alternative accommodation will be a protected or a secure tenancy, as appropriate. The amendments make it clear that in directing that the new tenancy will be a protected or a secure tenancy the court does so because it does not believe that an assured tenancy would offer the required security. The amendments thus clarify the position and guide the court in coming to a decision.

Amendment (a) is presumably based on the argument that the Lords amendments do not go far enough to meet the commitment that was indeed given in another place that the issue would be clarified, but we are entirely satisfied that our amendments meet the stated objective. It is true that they do not replicate the wording of the comparable provision in the Housing and Planning Act 1986. The wording of the 1986 Act was part of a consequential amendment to schedule 15 of the Rent Act. The wording of this Bill is part of a description of the types of tenancies which can be protected tenancies after commencement. In both cases, although the wording is different, the effect is that the court is not automatically to assume that an assured tenancy gives the required protection.

I can assure the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), despite the length, depth and breadth of feeling, that the provision as it now stands achieves what is needed, and his amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. Battle: I am grateful to the Secretary of State for his response. It is true that the concession for which we pressed in Committee received that response in the other place where it was reported in column 1457 of the House of Lords Hansard that the Minister said that the Government "accept the principle" behind the Opposition amendments seeking this change. On Third Reading, the Minister said that he had been advised that the Government amendments would meet our concerns. However I wish to press the Minister to ask him a forthright and open question. Will it still be open to a county court to decide that an assured tenancy per se is equivalent in terms of security of tenure to a Rent Act tenancy, regardless of the contractual terms drawn up between the tenant and the landlord? It would seem that the court is free to fuse the two, but in fusing the two, tenants' rights will be weakened.

If I may refer to other amendments in this group, it seems that the Government consistently have rejected an appeal for a housing association tenancy. That proposition was lost by a mere 18 votes in the other place. However, there are differences between a secure tenancy and an assured tenancy which should not be blurred at this stage. The blurring of those differences means that some tenants will lose out. The issue particularly affects all new housing associations tenants, including any who may transfer under housing association trusts that are set up by the Government, or any public sector tenancies that are transferred to housing associations, as their security may be diminished when someone moves.

I urge the Minister to spell out that that will not be the case and give the courts clear guidance to ensure that the distinction is not fused. Otherwise, when the Bill is enacted, this section will be tested by case law and inevitably tenants will have to go through the courts to prove the difference between a secure tenancy and an assured tenancy.

I hope that, even at this eleventh hour, the Minister will reconsider the case for allowing a housing association tenancy. Housing associations have made it plain that they do not want to be considered simply as existing in the private sector. They are between the private sector and the public sector, and tenants of registered housing associations currently enjoy security of tenure and the package of rights that has become known as the tenants' charter. Those rights were introduced by this Government in the Housing Act 1980 and further Acts including the Building Act 1984 have received support from housing associations, local authorities and institutes of housing. Housing association tenants need to be clear that their rights will not be diminished, particularly with the prospect of public sector tenants moving to housing associations. Those rights include their right of tenure, their right of exchange, their right to take in lodgers, their right to sublet part of their house, their right to repair and improve their dwelling and their right to information about their tenancies.

I hope that the Government will reconsider the proposition that there should be a distinct and separate housing association tenancy. The amendments should not leave a fudge in the Bill so that tenants are unclear as to their rights and have to resort to the courts for definitions to find out the terms of their tenancies.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The title of clause 35—

"Removal of special regimes for tenancies of housing associations etc."— shows that we are entering important territory. I shall not repeat the points made by the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle), with which I agreed. When it comes to a vote, I and my hon. Friends will support the Labour party's amendment to the Lords amendment, which raises several matters that the Secretary of State did not deal with.

11 pm

As is clear from the Bill, Government policy has now broken the consensus about the role of housing associations. That has created enormous uncertainty in the housing association movement. The Secretary of State will know of the long debates we had in Committee about the status of these associations. The hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) tried at first to claim that they were public sector bodies: they are not. Labour Members—and all other hon. Members—agreed that they were not. [Interruption.] They are not public sector bodies, and the sooner the Labour party realises that, the better.

The then Minister for Housing tried to imply that housing associations were private sector bodies. Eventually, I got him to agree that they were not that, either. Nevertheless, they are being forced into a private sector regime. The housing association movement is unhappy about that. It has always seen its role as providing social housing for people who, according to the evidence of the latest survey, are on incomes just above social security levels and are in need of such housing.

I understand that the Prime Minister is now giving some encouragement to the idea of housing associations being perceived as private sector. I understand that she no longer wants the phrase "social housing" to be used; she wants this sector to be known as "subsidised housing". She is not in favour of housing associations being thought of as providing social housing. She wants it clearly stated that housing associations will be subsidised by housing association grant, and hence by Housing Corporation money—hence by public, taxpayers' money. If all that is true, and the Minister confirms it, it is very worrying and will be the first admission of such a state of affairs by the Government. Will this new terminology be heard after the Bill becomes law?

If what I understand is correct, it is a reflection of the Government's main motive in housing matters: gradually to reduce subsidy, without which the housing association movement cannot prosper.

This is Catch-22: the Secretary of State and his junior Minister have said that they need housing associations for their plans for the demunicipalisation of local government housing to succeed. I concede that more grant was allocated to the Housing Corporation in last week's Autumn Statement. If the corporation receives substantially more money in coming years to cope with the expected massively increased demands that will be placed on it, it should in theory be possible for that money to filter down to fund the growth of housing associations. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House would welcome that, as they regard housing associations as having a good record and representing a worthy third component in the provision of rented housing in Britain.

The housing associations are clearly saying that they do not want to be dragged up market. They want to continue to provide for their traditional client groups—mainly people at the bottom of the income scale. They will not be able to expand under the policies that the Government are forcing them to adopt without abandoning many of those groups. They are in a dilemma. They are being told that they must expand, yet at the same time subsidy is being reduced and private sector money is being encouraged to come in. I do not object to private sector involvement in itself, but without sufficient subsidy—in London that means 75 or 80 per cent., if not 100 per cent.—most housing associations will not expand. They will certainly not be able to expand to pick up the increasing number of people on low incomes who will need rented housing and who will not find it in the private sector. In theory, those on housing benefit should be able to find it, because housing benefit should cover the rents, but we know from previous debates that that will not happen in practice.

If the housing association movement does not get the subsidy that it needs, it will not expand its operations but will prefer to continue on its present scale, housing the same people as it houses now. It will not fulfil the role that the Government have repeatedly said they wish it to fulfil.

After a year of debate, the Government still have not accepted the legitimate and reasonable wishes of the housing association movement or heeded the experienced voices of those in that movement. If they continue to fail to heed them—I say this more in sorrow than in anger—plans to expand the housing association movement may fail.

Those who have worked in the housing association movement know what they are talking about. They know which client group they want to serve and the criteria that have to be met if they are to do so. By their intransigence the Government will ensure that their policies for what most of us are not unhappy to call "social housing" will fail. I believe that there should be social housing; I am also happy for it to be called partnership housing. We need housing, provided in part with public funds, to meet the need of a particular client group. It would alleviate the housing associations' fears to some extent and reassure their tenants and prospective tenants if the Secretary of State—at the eleventh hour both literally and constitutionally—would give them greater encouragement.

I propose to press the Secretary of State once more on the question of what will constitute an affordable rent. On the basis of public assurances given by the Government so far, there seems to be absolutely no reason why they should not accept that affordable rents should be built into the regime that they are planning. The Secretary of State and his ministerial colleagues have come up with wording that suggests that they will impose on the Housing Corporation a duty to impose on housing associations a rent regime limiting rents in that sector to amounts that people in reasonable and low-paid employment can manage.

We need a statement from the Secretary of State to the effect that there will be sensible and affordable rents, as was orginally suggested in the consultation paper. In Committee, on Report, in the tenants' guarantee, in the Housing Corporation document about criteria for tenants' choice landlords and in the other place it has been implied that rents will be affordable. That was never defined and a year later we still do not know what it means.

Will the Secretary of State define, at today's prices, what an affordable rent for those on low pay would be? Would it be 20, 30 or 40 per cent. of the average manual wage in a given region? Without a figure, the phraseology is almost meaningless. I hope that the Secretary of State will give us a definition today. If not, will he give an undertaking that the concept of affordable rents will be defined in good time for the Housing Corporation and housing associations to understand what it means? The Housing Corporation also needs to know so that it can calculate the amount of income coming in and advise associations accordingly.

As the Secretary of State knows, the housing associations have made it clear that they want explicit provisions as to what rents are affordable, but the Government have so far resisted that request. At this late stage, we ask the Government to answer the question put to them by reputable housing professionals who know the low incomes of their clientele, the cause that the associations were set up to serve, and the massive pressure for affordable housing that there will be in the weeks and months ahead. Can we not have a guarantee on the face of the legislation that substance will be given to oral assurances about what exactly an affordable rent is?

The housing association movement began its consideration of the Government's proposals both troubled and anxious. The Government made various promises about tenants' guarantees and then resiled from them, so the guarantees are now less substantial than the housing associations were led to believe. The shape of the Bill has changed before their—and our—very eyes. I make this request to the Secretary of State because I am prepared to accept that he wants an expansion of housing associations and that that would be a good thing for the country. Now is the time to give the housing associations the reassurance that they seek and, if he can, to state that it is untrue that the Prime Minister and the Government wish to see an end to the defined concept of social housing. Can he assure us that the Government are willing to continue to use the term and to give people in such housing the same respect and status as anyone else, and that they do not intend to start defining housing associations as part of the private sector and social housing as subsidised housing and thus seek to go down the slippery slope which eventually leads to less and less grant, higher and higher rents and less and less ability to meet real housing need?

Mr. Winnick: I support the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) who, I believe, described himself earlier as a Liberal.

Mr. Simon Hughes: There are two more here now.

Mr. Winnick: We always admire those who do not seek to hide their true political feelings and affiliations. One of the hon. Gentleman's two hon. Friends who also describe themselves as Liberals—the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith)—was an unsuccessful candidate for the leadership of his party. I am sorry about that, but I was not given a vote.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Like the tenants.

Mr. Winnick: Yes, we shall be coming to that in due course, but on future occasions we shall certainly know the party colours and affiliations of the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends.

I support what the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey said not just because he told us earlier that he was a Liberal but because of the need for affordable rents to which he referred in his speech.

One danger is that, because of the Government's allocation of grant, housing associations will have to charge rents that are virtually market rents—[Interruption.] If Conservative Members want to talk, they should go to the Tea Room. Alternatively, they should be silent and take part in the debate later. This is a crucial issue. It gives me no pleasure to say this, but I find it disquieting that Conservative Members are not taking part in the debate. It is almost as though they were in Committee. Do they not have constituents who are concerned about these matters? Three Conservative Members are still engaged in private conversation. One is the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes). He is not paying any attention to the debate or to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is engaged in some intrigue within the Tory party——

11.15 pm

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Conversations are taking place in different parts of the Chamber. We must get back to the amendment.

Mr. Winnick: I was pleased to hear you say that, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as I should be only too pleased to return to the amendment. Conservative Members are——

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Some of us are interested in the view of the Conservative party on these matters. If there is any chance that the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) is discussing them and the relevant amendment, we should be most interested to hear what he has to say. If any of his colleagues choose to enlighten the House——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Let us first hear what the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) has to say.

Mr. Ridley: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Can you tell me when we were actually discussing the amendment? It has not been mentioned yet.

Mr. Winnick: I do not think that such reflections on the Chair really help our proceedings. It is rather unfortunate that the Secretary of State wants to make some cheap debating points. We are inviting contributions from Conservative Members on the issues before us.

What the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey said is of crucial importance because the housing associations take responsibility for housing those in need. A survey in 1988 by the National Federation of Housing Associations showed that the four most common reasons for rehousing were overcrowding, ill health, leaving temporary accommodation and poor housing conditions. Those accounted for 46 per cent. of all the reasons for rehousing.

If the housing associations are fulfilling a role—to a large extent because the local authorities cannot carry out their usual traditional housing responsibilities—we must be concerned, and I hope that it concerns the Secretary of State, if the changes in the grant allocation mean that housing associations will have to charge rents that people in need, those whom they are trying to help, cannot pay.

Mr. Ridley: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The amendments are mainly technical, dealing with various matters arising from the transition of an existing Rent Act regime to the new assured tenancy regime to be established under the Bill. Can you explain to me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, how a wide-ranging debate on housing associations can be relevant to the amendments?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must admit that this is all rather confusing. I have been trying hard to relate the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the amendments and it is difficult to do so. I hope that he and other hon. Members will now address their remarks to the amendments before the House.

Mr. Soley: Further to that point of order Mr. Deputy Speaker. I accept that nobody wants hon. Members to stray out of order, but the Secretary of State is wholly wrong in saying that these are mainly technical amendments. They are not. They are deep and wide ranging, and have implications for rent levels. I would think that so long as the debate is about that it will be in order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I found it hard to relate the earlier remarks to these amendments and I hope that the hon. Member for Walsall, North will now relate his remarks directly to them.

Mr. Winnick: Obviously, I abide by whatever you say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I would have thought that security matters relate to the level of rent, as do housing associations which must decide on rent in the light of their grant allocation. As my remarks are in line with those of previous speakers, I trust that they are in order. [Interruption.] It is all very well for Ministers to make those sounds. If they want to sleep they can go elsewhere.

I listed the group of people that housing associations have been assisting. We must consider the level of rents and how it will be possible for those in need to be assisted in the way that those in need are being helped by housing associations now. It is extremely important that the security given to a tenant is the same as that provided by the Rent Act 1977. That is not the case at present. Any form of insecurity causes anxiety.

We are trying first and foremost to establish the level of security and the way that courts will decide. I hope that when the Minister replies he will respond to our points about housing associations because they raise important matters for those who will seek to be rehoused by housing associations. As local authorities are no longer able to assist people because no building is taking place, it is all the more reason why some protection should be given to those who cannot afford market rents.

The crux of the argument which seems to puzzle Conservative Members is simply: what will the Government do for those who cannot afford a mortgage or market rents, who do not stand a chance of being rehoused by a local authority and who are likely no longer to be assisted by a housing association because of the level of rents which they will be forced to charge? Surely those are legitimate points which must concern us, even if, unfortunately, they do not concern Conservative Members. I am sure that I am supported in that by my hon. Friends.

Mr. Boateng: My hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) is to be congratulated. He has driven the Secretary of State from the Chamber. The fox has gone to ground, leaving his rather bedraggled pup to mind the lair, and by the time we have finished with him tonight, he will look even more bedraggled.

Mr. Patnick: The hon. Gentleman should get the zoological species correct. Foxes have cubs, not pups.

Mr. Morgan: The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) forgets that we are dealing with the Housing Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) at least got the lair right.

Mr. Boateng: Whether it be cub or pup, we are dealing with an animal that has four legs and is looking increasingly bedraggled and uncertain without the intrusive presence of the Secretary of State. At 11.25 pm we should not be debating the species to which the Under-Secretary belongs. He is all too revealing in the shape that he takes before us, and we do not want to enter into a semantic argument about whether he is a cub or a pup. He is at bay, which is all that matters.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) would not wish to mislead anyone reading the record of this debate. He may have conveyed the impression that the Secretary of State, having graced our proceedings throughout the night, had just left the Chamber. He looked in for only a comparatively short time.

Mr. Boateng: My right hon. and learned Friend is, once again, right. The record should show the extent of the Secretary of State's appearances in the debate. The record should show that Ministers, recumbent on the Front Bench, have from time to time been heard to mutter and mumble comments about relevance and sticking to the amendment. Among those Ministers, a particularly spirited response——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I may mumble something about sticking to the amendment. The hon. Gentleman has been speaking for a little over three minutes, but has not referred to the amendment. I hope that he will do so quickly.

Mr. Boateng: I am suitably chastened. I was trying to set the context of the amendment.

The drafting of amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 44 is simple enough. We wish to insert the word "secure." What could be less threatening? Amendment No. 44 has received a warm welcome from Labour Members. It adds to the circumstances in which a housing association can grant a secure tenancy with a fair rent. That is a good in itself, because the Bill seeks destructively to undermine the true role of housing associations in the provision of houses for those who need them. Amendment (a) seeks to redress the balance.

The former Minister for Housing and Planning used to visit hon. Members' constituencies——

Mr. Tony Banks: Whipping up apathy.

Mr. Boateng: The Minister seldom managed to convince his audiences, but he suggested to the housing association movement that when the Bill was passed it would have a new role to play. That is why the amendment is so important. For a moment, we feared that it might be possible for him to separate the housing association movement from the local authorities and communities which they were set up to serve. That was the purpose. The Minister was not out whipping up apathy for the fun of it or simply seeking to establish a reputation as an industrious Minister of State. If his intention was to retain that position, he failed because he did not survive the Bill, just as a number of us predicted. Perhaps the current incumbent is not much longer for the portfolio either, but we will not speculate. We shall return to the amendment and see why it is so important.

11.30 pm

The amendment preserves the traditional and historic role of the housing association movement. It should not be used to undermine local authorities or the public provision of housing, secured through the ratepayers and taxpayers. It should complement the local authorities. That was recognised by the housing association movement. That is why the Minister failed in his primary objective to disengage the housing association movement from the local authorities and communities which they serve.

To make sure that that does not happen, even after the passage of the Bill, we have proposed the amendment, which provides that, where a housing association purchases a property containing a tenant with a statutory or protected tenancy, the association can grant that tenant a secure tenancy with a fair rent. The amendment seeks to extend this so that, where an association takes over a property with a secure tenant, it will also be able to grant that tenant a secure tenancy at a fair rent. That is a modest enough proposal, but one to which Conservative Members may be resistant because it contains a particularly unpalatable truth for them. It underpins the need to recognise the special roles of housing associations as bodies to meet special needs.

A number of groups will benefit from the amendment, including those who are disabled and require properties that are specially adapted and those who at a particular stage in their lives, whether through old age or youth, require special housing provision in terms of the management of their household or the kind of units available. Our vision is not of a society in which a person is fixed into one form of occupancy. One sees from one's constituency cases that old people find it particularly hard to maintain homes which are sometimes too big for them.

Mrs. Mahon: I hope that I can flush the Minister out of his hole and get him to reply to a question which I have tabled and which I asked him earlier tonight. Why have the Government seen fit to sabotage the excellent scheme proposed by the Stoneham housing association for deprived young people? That housing association and my local authority would have provided 30 places in what is now an empty tower block. They would have helped to restore and bring that tower block back into use for housing. Because of the inadequacies of housing grants, we have not been able to repair that tower block. It is sad that that group of clients has been left virtually homeless.

Mr. Boateng: Halifax is remarkable, not only by reference to the quality of its representation in the House but by reference to its capacity to produce an example for every aspect of the Bill. Whenever there is an amendment, there is always an example readily to hand from my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon). It must be a truly remarkable place in which to live, with its diverse problems and the breadth of its need for housing.

I see that Brer Fox has returned to the lair. If he will pay attention for one moment, he will hear that what we are particularly concerned about in this amendment is that the sort of scheme that has been referred to in Halifax should be able to grow and develop. Our vision of housing provision is that people should be able to move into and out of appropriate housing throughout their lives. When they are young and making the transition from home into the private or public rented sector or even into owner-occupancy, guidance should be provided for them. As they grow too——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is again moving away from the amendment.

Mr. Boateng: Then I shall return to it. There is a stage in a person's life when Lords amendment No. 44 becomes particularly relevant on account of the change in the nature of the tenancy because of the age of the tenant, his financial position or his health and general family circumstances. Such people may wish to move into housing association property. Lords amendment No. 44 should therefore be written into the Bill so that housing associations are able to make the necessary provisions for them. Without the amendment, housing associations will not be on hand and will be unable to meet their special needs.

We know that the Secretary of State and the Under-Secretary of State have received an overwhelming number of representations from the National Federation of Housing Associations. That has been a word of warning to them. The federation has asked the Government to enable the movement to grow in order to take advantage of the opportunities that the Government say they seek to provide by means of the Housing Corporation. Without the amendment, it will be unable to take advantage of those opportunities, which we believe ought to be provided. We ask the Government truly to liberate the housing association movement and allow it to play its role alongside local authorities in providing for the needs of our people.

Mr. Tony Banks: I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for having been caught short on amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 37. One lives and learns. I shall not be caught out on Lords amendment No. 76 and amendment (a) to it, but I shall give the Secretary of State his due on that one.

The Secretary of State said that these are technical amendments. Some of them appear to be very technical and we need to ask questions about them. Lords amendment No. 40 attempts to ensure that protected shorthold tenants who have been granted tenancies before the Bill becomes law under the current arrangements for creating protected shorthold tenancies do not become assured tenancies or protected tenancies by virtue of the arrangements in this part of the Bill. That includes cases where the landlord does not serve the correct notices for creating a new style of assured shorthold tenancy.

It is clear from these so-called technical amendments that the Government are prepared to create the most absurdly complicated sections and subsections to preserve the insecurity of protected shorthold tenancies.

We shall not oppose amendments Nos. 38, 39 and 40, but we believe that they demonstrate how much the Government are the party of the landlord and how they are prepared to frame legislation to ensure that landlords have a free hand. That has always been the philosophy behind the Bill. Although the Secretary of State may say that they are merely technical amendments, the philosophy behind them and the fact that the legislation becomes more complicated reveal the attitude and approach of the Government of the landlord.

Amendments Nos. 41 and 43 deal with housing association tenancies and with fairly complicated hypothetical problems that may occur at some time if a secure tenant becomes a housing association tenant under the provisions of part IV. A council tenant who is at present secure under the provisions of the Housing Act 1985 may be bought up by a housing association under the provisions of the pick-a-landlord proposals. At that point, the tenant would become an assured tenant.

But one must hesitate at that point. The Government are so anxious to preserve the right to buy that should the tenant exercise the right to buy his home at a discount and discover subsequently that his house was built to a defective design—perhaps the Bison system—the housing association can buy back the flat so that the owner-occupier does not have the headache of a useless asset on his hands. Under these provisions, that tenant then becomes a secure tenant—unlike his neighbours, who were not so foolish as to exercise the right to buy and who are merely assured tenants.

The dice are always loaded, certainly with regard to the right to buy. The Government may say that they are just technical amendments, but when one understands the thought that went into them they reveal the hand of the Secretary of State. Amendments Nos. 41 and 43 are absurd.

But perhaps the Secretary of State will tell me that my timing is wrong. Perhaps it is only when a tenant has exercised the right to buy before the estate or block is taken over by the new landlord that he can become a secure tenant when he sells his property back to his landlord. I should be most grateful if the Minister would answer that question and explain the amendments so that I may know whether my interpretation is correct. If it is wrong, the Secretary of State has a great body of experts round him who can tell us, through him, exactly what the amendments mean.

To get a better understanding of these technical amendments, I thought that the best thing would be to turn to the debate in the other place. But when I read the Lords Hansard I saw no evidence that the Earl of Caithness understood the amendment. It was moved formally and there was no debate. So we still do not know precisely what the amendments are about and must struggle to interpret the amendments ourselves.

Lords amendment No. 44 relates to clause 35, which falls in chapter V of part I. Chapter V is a complicated but crucial part of the Bill. It is the mechanism by which the Government intend to destroy current arrangements for the protection of tenants, so that the new regimes of the market place—the assured tenancy and the assured shorthold tenancy—can take over.

Chapter V is entitled:

"Phasing out of Rents Acts and other Transitional Provisions."

Clause 35 states that a tenancy cannot be a housing association tenancy unless it falls into one of several exceptions, which include where the tenancy was granted as part of a contract formed before the Act became law, where it is granted to the same person who before the grant was already a protected tenant of substantially the same accommodation, and where the new tenancy arises from the tenant having to move as a result of a court order which states that the new tenancy is equivalent to "suitable alternative accommodation".

Lords amendment No. 44 sets out another exception to the number of new housing association secure tenancies that can be granted. When a housing association buys a property in the private sector which already has protected tenants—the so-called sitting tenants—in it, the tenants are permitted to become secure tenants under the Housing Act 1985 rather than new style assured tenants.

I am obviously in favour of the amendment. It seems eminently sensible and fair. We all know that housing associations do a great deal of good when they intervene in the wholly inadequate private sector, buy privately rented property, improve it, convert it and let it to people in need of low-cost rented housing. The Government want to make all publicly provided accommodation housing association accommodation, and to take it all away from local authorities. We heard some interesting exchanges on that subject between my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) and the Under-Secretary of State.

We do not want to hinder housing associations that want to take up property in the private sector and improve it.

Mr. Winnick: Does my hon. Friend know that the survey conducted by the National Federation of Housing Associations, which I quoted earlier, shows that the average net weekly household income of people who were given accommodation by housing associations was £77·50, compared with average national earnings of £224? The average net weekly income for households with nobody in work is £58·99 and the average for households with one person in work is £115. Does my hon. Friend agree that those figures illustrate the type of problem we are dealing with? Perhaps the Secretary of State does not realise its seriousness. People now being assisted by housing associations are in the main, though not exclusively, on small incomes. To the extent that housing associations will be forced to charge something near the market rent, the people I have described cannot be helped.

Mr. Banks: I agree. One of the insidious things about the Bill is the way in which the role of housing associations is being changed. It is clear from the submissions that the Government received from housing associations that the associations do not like that.

There are times when I do not understand Conservative Members. Either they have no knowledge of what it is like in the bottom league or they have not attempted to find out or—worse—they know but do not care. We all have decent homes. None of us can be compared with the people who will be caught out by the Bill. All Conservative Members are fairly comfortable, and some are living in the lap of luxury. Good luck to them, I suppose.

Mr. Winnick: I would not go as far as that.

Mr. Banks: I am trying to be as generous as I can. Conservative Members do not have to experience housing difficulties and they do not understand what they are all about. When they move their amendments without being aware of the impact that they will have on those who are in the poorest sections of our society, it is not suprising that we become angry and embittered towards the Government. To be frank, we do not believe a word that they say. I wish that they would make more attempts directly to learn for themselves how badly off some people are in the private sector and in many parts of the public sector.

When considering Lords amendment No. 44, we must remember that housing associations are seeking to buy and improve privately owned property so that they can provide some decent housing. As always, I turned to Newham to ascertain the state of houses in the privately rented sector, and I can report that it is appalling. The 1985 house condition survey on properties in Newham has demonstrated that the fabric of our private sector housing stock is becoming unfit at a faster rate than it is being repaired.

Most of the 45,000 dwellings that make up the private sector stock in Newham are pre-1919 properties. They are coming to the end of their useful life unless major renovation is carried out in the near future. It seems that 57 per cent. of private sector dwellings in the borough are unsatisfactory, which equates to 26,000 dwellings. The results of the survey told us that 83 per cent. of private rented dwellings were unsatisfactory and that 52 per cent. of owner-occupied dwellings were unsatisfactory. Unsatisfactory means unfit and/or lacking basic amenities and/or in serious disrepair. No Member of this place has to live in such housing.

Disrepair is becoming worse in Newham. In 1981, a total of 37 per cent. of private rented dwellings were unfit——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is getting a long way from the amendment.

Mr. Banks: I am directing myself to Lords amendment No. 44 and the role of housing associations within the terms of the amendment. The associations buy inadequate private sector property, or inadequate privately rented property, and improve it. That is within the terms of the amendment. I must accept what you say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I am trying only to demonstrate the enormity of the associations' task under the amendment and of their role generally. They have a major problem to deal with in Newham.

I hope that the Government will accept Lords amendment No. 44. If they fail to do so, the role of the housing associations could be undermined.

It is fairly common practice for associations to buy tenanted properties, especially in a period of rising property prices which lead to increasing difficulties for associations that wish to buy properties and improve them within the cost constraints set by the Housing Corporation. Tenanted properties sell at cheaper prices. Indeed, some would sell for about half their vacant possession value. This means that they are attractive to property speculators. They buy them, winkle out the tenants and sell them with vacant possession.

It is important that housing associations should be encouraged to buy in this market. The properties can be bought at reasonable prices and converted to achieve a housing gain for the housing association movement. For example, a house in multiple occupation with one sitting tenant can be converted into three flats, which means that there is a housing gain. Housing that is sold with sitting tenants is usually run down, badly managed, with inadequate repairs and fire precautions. The tenants, as I know from my own experience, are often old and vulnerable people who have been unable, for one reason or another, to get a foothold in the owner-occupation market. It requires the sensitive handling of the housing association to achieve that repair and improvement without too much distress or disruption to the vulnerable tenant.

[Mr. Banks]

If Lords amendment No. 44 is accepted, the home of a private protected tenant which is bought by a housing association can become a secure tenancy. If it is not accepted, that tenancy will become an assured tenancy under the new rules set out in part I.

One might ask what is the difference between a secure tenancy, a protected tenancy and an assured tenancy. It is a difficult question. Many people in my borough are asking those questions all the time. I wonder how many Members of this House or the other place know.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Is this debate relevant to properties owned by the London and Quadrant housing association in areas of my hon. Friend's constituency such as Disraeli road, where I happen to know properties are being developed and put on the market? Is it important to people living in such property?

Mr. Banks: It certainly is. I think that my hon. Friend knows that that housing association is located in my constituency. My hon. Friend should perhaps admit a certain interest. However, I shall pass over that. It is not the sort of interest that would infringe his right to speak in this place. I think that my hon. Friends know what that interest is and we must congratulate him on having such an intelligent member of his family working for that housing association and living in that area.

Let me return to the differences between a secure tenancy, a protected tenancy and an assured tenancy. They always sound alike. Why should not a tenant in the situation that I described become an assured tenant rather than a secure tenant?

Mr. Winnick: Could it be that the lack of interventions from Conservative Members—not one Conservative Member has spoken since the proceedings began—is related to the fact that quite a number of them have substantial property interests and simply do not want to reveal them because many of them will gain as a result of the Bill becoming law?

Mr. Banks: That may well be the case. It would be useful if Conservative Members could join in the debate. It is supposed to be a debate. It is not, of course, and nor was it in Committee. That is one reason why I desperately want to have this place televised. I want people to see exactly what goes on in this place. I know that Conservative Members are just sitting around waiting for the next Division, hoping that it will be sooner rather than later.

Mr. Faulds: I do not want to follow my hon. Friend into any irrelevance, but is it not likely that if we were to have the disastrous intrusion of the cameras into this place, the political affiliations of most of the people who own the television companies involved in that would, like the popular press, try to defend all the interests of Conservative Members? The television companies will take the greatest trouble——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. None of that has anything to do with Lords amendment No. 44. Can we get back to secure or assured tenancies?

Mr. Banks: I accept immediately what you say, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am always prepared to give way to may hon. Friend the Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds). It is so good to have him here at a time other than Prime Minister's Question Time.

Mr. Battle: It may be that we do not see the televising of the House of Commons in terms of censorship, but I am certain that many housing associations have lobbied Conservative Members on this issue and they will have to answer to their constituents for not being able to assure them that the housing associations will not be prejudiced by the Bill.

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend makes another good point, for, in speaking to Lords amendment No. 44, one realises what is happening in this place and with this Bill, against the interests of those who are desperately in search of housing.

Many of these amendments are so complicated and confusing that it is hardly surprising that many outside the House find it difficult to establish their rights. One begins to get cynical, and I resist that as much as I can, as you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, know. None the less, one reaches a point where such obfuscation appears to be deliberate, to ensure that people desperately in need of housing can never find out what are their real rights.

12 midnight

Mr. Cryer: My hon. Friend refers to the differences between an assured and a secure tenancy, and comments that perhaps Conservative Members are voting for this legislation because they have property and wish to see a change in the nature of tenancies in order to exploit their own tenants more. Will my hon. Friend comment on the obligation that is placed on all right hon. and hon. Members, under a requirement of "Erskine May", not to vote for any legislation that will give them a financial advantage? It may be that we shall see a diminution in the numbers voting against the amendment.

Mr. Banks: The passage of time will lead to a diminution in the number of Conservative Members voting on the amendment. Nevertheless, I know that I can count on my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) to point out to any recalcitrant Conservative Members what are their obligations and responsibilities, for I know that he is a keen student of the pecuniary interest register. He probably has the mark of every Conservative Member currently sitting on the Government Benches.

I return to the differences between protected, secure and assured tenancies. They all sound as though they are good things, but it is here that the Bill is deceitful. There are many similarities between a protected and a secure tenancy. It will not do an individual any harm changing from a protected to a secure tenancy, but there is a huge difference between a protected or secure tenancy and an assured tenancy, but that is what the Government intended all the way along.

The rents of protected tenants are set by the rent officer at fair levels that disregard the scarcity of accommodation. Under the present housing association arrangements, the same regime of the rent officer setting fair rents applies. However, if there is a change to an assured tenancy, the rent will be fixed by the rent assessment committee at market levels.

Mr. Cryer: Will my right hon. Friend comment on the fact that the fair rent regime, which is being undermined by Lords amendment No. 44, does not provide that much protection? If a tenant improves a property owned by his landlord, the fair rent officer must take any such improvement into account when fixing the rent.

The Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not see how any of those points can be raised under the amendments now before the House.

Mr. Banks: I was about to say that I disagree with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I cannot disagree, I do not disagree, and I never shall disagree with you—though on this occasion I believe that I do.

In the case of a protected tenant, there are a number of grounds on which a landlord can obtain possession. They are broadly similar to those shown in the Housing Act 1985 as grounds for possession against a secure tenant. One important element is that if a landlord wishes to seek possession on the grounds of a fault, where it is claimed by the landlord that the tenant is at fault in some way—for example, in not paying the rent—such grounds are discretionary and the landlord must show not only that the tenant is at fault but that it is reasonable that the court should make a possession order.

Should the tenancy be changed to an assured tenancy, however, the position will be different. For the first time, under the Bill, one of the so-called "fault" grounds becomes a mandatory ground for possession. If a tenant is three months in arrears with his or her rent—even if the arrears are not the tenants's fault—the court has no choice but to make an order for possession. Being an assured rather than a secure tenant would make a considerable difference to the person concerned.

As a protected tenant, a tenant in the private sector can currently pass on his or her tenancy twice, first to a spouse and then to a member of his or her family. Of course, the Government are proposing to change the rules, even for existing tenants, so that, although spouses can inherit a tenancy, members of the family can only do so—and it will be an assured tenancy—if they have lived in the accommodation for at least two years at the time of the tenant's death.

The important issue is that succession rights can be passed on to members of the family as well as to the spouse. If a private tenant's home is then bought by a housing association—which is the subject of the Lords amendment—that tenant will become secure. Secure tenants have similar, although not identical, rights in regard to succession. They can pass on their tenancy only once, although it can be to a spouse or, if there is no spouse, to another member of the family who has been living in the accommodation for at least 12 months at the time of succession.

Should the tenancy become an assured tenancy at the time of purchase, rather than a secure tenancy as suggested by the Lords amendment, there can be only one succession on death—and that to the spouse only. That is particularly hard on carers who move in to look after an elderly relative. Once the tenant dies, the carer, who may have devoted a good part of his or her life and attention to that relative, finds that as a reward for his labours at the same time as having to face up to a bereavement he must face the prospect of losing his home.

Mrs. Mahon: The carer will often have also lost out on any kind of career, finding himself years later on a much reduced income. That is an added anxiety, which is making people stop to think, "Shall I do this, or do what I least want to do and throw an elderly or sick person on to the state?"

Mr. Banks: That is an important point. The Government have talked about people being turned out of long-stay hospital beds and being looked after in the community. It sounds fine, but the Bill could penalise their carers, and that strikes me as disgraceful.

I do not know whether the Under-Secretary is fully aware of that implication. We explained it in some detail in Committee, but of course he was not there at the time. He has a very tenuous grip on his present job. This is a bit of a graveyard for aspiring Conservative politicians. I do not wish the Minister any ill, because it is not in my heart to wish any Conservative Members ill. That is why I still hope that somewhere within their breasts beat hearts that may still be turned by our pleas. The Secretary of State, in particular, looks at me with that stony, skull-like look that almost belies the thought that he even has a heart. But I do not give up hope even for him at this stage.

Mr. Morgan: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. He referred to graveyards. Another graveyard with which we have become familiar during the past 12 months is the graveyard where the Government put reports when they do not know what to do with them. The Griffiths report made exactly the same point as my hon. Friend. It recommended extremely strongly that a far better variety of care would be provided by close relatives within the family. However, this legislation is making it far more difficult for relatives who have to give up their jobs to look after sick parents or children. I have an extremely difficult case in my constituency where a young lady in her mid-20s is being evicted from her home, having given up her career to look after first her mother and then her father over something like a 10-year period. She has never worked, other than looking after her elderly relatives. That is the reward that such people will get if this measure becomes law.

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend is absolutely right and demonstrates the internal inconsistencies between the Government's stated intentions and the legislation that they bring before the House. That is why it is difficult for us to accept at face value almost anything that is said by Conservative Members.

For the three reasons that I have already mentioned —rent, security and succession—we support the Lords amendments. The Government may not accept the argument, but not only is it better for tenants that they should become secure rather than assured tenants, but the loss of security faced by the tenant may undermine the potential relationship between the housing associations and their future tenants at the time of purchase.

When housing associations are proposing to buy a property, they visit it, they take stock, measure it up, value it and talk to the tenants—unlike many private landlords who buy property in portfolios without ever talking to the people for whom it represents a home. One of the first questions that a tenant will ask a housing association is, "What will it mean for me?" If the housing association can reply, "You will become a secure tenant and, as a housing association tenant, you will have most of your rights that you have now, together with some additional ones such as the right to information and consultation, the right to assign and the right to exchange", it is quite likely that that tenant will be keen to become a housing association tenant. [Interruption.] Shut up. I do not mind interventions from Conservative Members, but I find sedentary interventions from my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) who is sitting 3 ft away from me to my left, to be rather disconcerting. [Interruption.] I beg your pardon, did a Conservative Member actually speak or was that a death rattle?

If a housing association has to say to a prospective tenant, "You will become an assured tenant and we can charge you a market rent which may mean that your rent will go up by a factor of four and there are more ways in which we can get you out" it would be quite understandable if the tenants showed a degree of reluctance to have their homes taken over by the housing association. That is why I put it to the Secretary of State that it might well undermine the work of the housing associations in buying into the private rented sector and carrying out their excellent improvement work to the fabric of our deteriorating private rented stock if the Lords amendment were not allowed to stand.

Mr. Cryer: I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that it would be a strange irony if the Government were not prepared to allow the Lords amendment to stand. They have supported housing associations as being a source of assistance from the private sector, as members of housing associations administer them often without any fee, simply as part of a voluntary contribution to society —the Lady Bountiful image that the Tories like to propound. If the Government do not allow the amendment to stand, they will be pushing aside the voluntary private sector and handing everything over to the private sector. Is that the general gist of my hon. Friend's remarks?

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend has a ready grasp of the situation, which I am sure is better than that of the Secretary of State who diverted me for a moment, because, as my hon. Friend was speaking, the Secretary of State was excavating the contents of his left nostril. [Laughter.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Banks: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It was not a pretty sight. [Laughter.] I am finding it difficult to continue, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

I turn now to amendment (a) to Lords amendment No. 44. Much as we like the Lords amendment, it can stand much improvement. Our amendment attempts to include among tenancies which can remain secure, and are granted after the Act comes into force tenants who become housing association tenants—[Interruption.] I think you should send for the nurse, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My hon. Friend the Member for Warley, East seems to be in need of her.

12.15 am

Mr. Faulds: Yes, please.

Mr. Banks: It would appear that my hon. Friend is having a seizure——

Mr. Faulds: My hon. Friend is such a comic that he must occasionally give the audience time to enjoy his quips. The more response he gets, the happier I should have thought he would be. I do not need a nurse now, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I may in a little while.

Mr. Banks: I know that this is often referred to as political theatre, but I had not realised that my hon. Friend had descended from the high dramatic roles he used to play to become a low comedy actor.

As I was saying, our amendment includes among tenancies granted after the Act which can remain secure any tenants who become housing association tenants when a housing association buys a property with them as sitting tenants—this time not as sitting tenants in the private sector but as sitting tenants in the public sector. Our amendment relates to the provisions of part IV of the Bill which are the tenants' choice proposals.

When the then Minister of State was selling us the proposals in part IV, he persuasively told us that no nasty, private developer-type landlords would prowl around trying to make a quick killing out of the proposals. We were prepared to take him at his word. We thought that he might represent the acceptable face of Tory extremism. But he gave so many undertakings and was so reasonable that he could not remain in the job. That is why he was sent to the Foreign Office. I am sure he is relieved to be far from the thorny problem which the Under-Secretary of State now finds himself facing. The hon. Gentleman's move to the Foreign Office was also a demonstration of how the Government treat Conservative Members who still have residues of heart, feelings and compassion: they move them on.

Mr. Winnick: Is my hon. Friend aware that if the former Minister had remained at the Department of the Environment he could have overridden some of the Secretary of State's objections, rendering our arguments unnecessary? It seems likely that the Secretary of State had a word with the Prime Minister to get the Minister transferred to another Department because there was a clear difference of opinion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Let us get back to amendment No. 44.

Mr. Banks: My hon. Friend made the point that I made earlier. When we discussed this part of the Bill before, the Minister said that only nice, respectable, friendly housing associations would be out to buy under these proposals. He did not know then that the Charity Commissioners might take a dim view of this sort of activity when carried out by bodies that were registered as charities, excluding at a stroke many housing associations from buying under this legislation. But we expect the Government to change the charity rule at any moment, to suit their needs. That is how they behave every time they find an obstacle in their path. That is the new Conservative party. Any opposition—from its Back Benchers, from the Labour party or from society in general—gets kicked.

Under part IV, a housing association may end up with a number of properties acquired from a local authority. As we have been told, some local authorities are already negotiating with housing associations to that end. In the amendment, we seek to ensure that if tenants end up as housing association tenants they enjoy security of tenure at least equivalent to that which they had as secure tenants when the property was owned by the local authority.

Housing associations broadly support the rights that secure tenants have under the tenants' charter. It is obvious that tenants would prefer to have more rights, rather than fewer; one hardly needs a PhD to work that out. The landlords want such a provision and the tenants want it, so why on earth are the Government refusing to allow tenants to keep rights that they have enjoyed as part of their contract since they first moved in, just because the landlord changes? No such dramatic change accompanies a change of landlord in the private sector. If one private landlord sells to another, the tenant keeps the rights that he has had since he first became a tenant of the property. Why should not the same arrangement occur in the public sector? When one public sector landlord sells to another —in this case a housing association—the tenant should keep the same rights.

If the Government are not prepared to accept our amendment, it will be clearly revealed that they would like to destroy all public sector tenancies and move everyone into the hands of private landlords. I suspect that that is what they would like to do. Thank God they have not been able to do it so far, but if anyone were stupid enough to allow them back again, I fear that that is what would happen. I hope that the Government will accept our amendment.

Mr. Ridley: With the leave of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall reply to those points relevant to the amendments before us. I congratulate Opposition Members on maintaining a filibuster of considerable standard—even, at times, of humour—wholly unrelated to the amendments. Opposition Members clearly showed a desire to remain here through the night, which cannot be justified by the content of the amendments.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) even went so far as to suggest that his constituency would benefit from a housing action trust, and talked about widespread dereliction and the poor condition of the housing stock. It was an interesting suggestion, which we shall consider.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Ridley: No. The hon. Gentleman has spoken for hours. I have only just started.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) got into a bit of a muddle. He seemed to demand continuing subsidy for housing associations. He will know from the public expenditure line to which he referred that that is our intention. With private finance coming in, that means a greatly expanded programme and, by definition, low rents. What else is the subsidy for? The very word "subsidy" would guarantee what the hon. Gentleman seeks.

The hon. Gentleman then seemed to suggest that such houses should not be called subsidised. He must make up his mind whether he wants the subsidy or not.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Secretary of State give way?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman has bored the House for hours already, but I shall nevertheless give way.

Mr. Hughes: I asked the Secretary of State two simple questions. First, is he changing the wording from "social housing" to "subsidised housing" as a matter of policy? Secondly, I asked at what figure rents would be set after the subsidy, so that the housing association movement and its tenants might know what sort of figure we were talking about.

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman must not believe everything that he reads in the papers. He obviously picks up his information from gossip columns. He should really be a little more sophisticated than that. He said that now was the time when I should suddenly announce a new rents policy. I do not think that this is the time. I think that it is time to consider amendment No. 40, et alia, which are very limited, and well past the time when we should reach a conclusion on them.

With regard to the points of substance that were raised, the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) asked whether the terms would be better or worse in the circumstances that he described. It will, of course, depend on the terms of the contract whether an assured tenancy is deemed by the court to offer equivalent security or not. All contracts will be different and it will be for the courts to interpret the answer to the hon. Gentleman's question.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West asked what amendment No. 40 does. I shall tell him. It provides that where, on or after the commencement of the Bill, a landlord grants a new assured tenancy to someone who has hitherto been a tenant under a protected shorthold tenancy or a tenancy superseding such a tenancy, that new tenancy will automatically be an assured shorthold tenancy without the landlord having to serve notice to that effect. Whether the tremendous edifice of rhetoric that the hon. Gentleman built upon that simple and limited proposition is justified, I leave it to the House to decide.

The hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) asked what was the Government's view of Opposition amendment (a) to amendment No. 44. It would have the effect of extending the provision to include any existing secure tenancy taken over by a housing association and would thus run counter to the Government's intention throughout the Bill that secure tenancies taken over by a housing association as part of a transfer of stock by a local authority should become new style assured tenancies. The Opposition amendment would destroy that change to the new type of tenancy and I ask the House to reject it.

Mr. Soley: The Secretary of State refers to a filibuster, but he does not know what he is talking about. I will tell him what a filibuster is—it is 273 Lords amendments. What does the Secretary of State think that he is doing coming to the House for the second time with about 300 amendments to one hell of a mess of a Bill? So far, he has sacked one Minister and pushed another out—the one sitting beside him now will not last much longer—but the person responsible for the whole mess is the Secretary of State himself. He brought it upon himself and he deserves every bit of it because he has caused more anguish, fear and anxiety to tenants in both the private and the public sector than any other Minister at the Department of the Environment ever has. People are terrified of what he is doing to them. Yet he comes here talking about a filibuster.

The Secretary of State has learnt nothing yet. So far he has learnt only that the House of Lords has given us 62 pages of serious amendments. We may occasionally drift into a moment of levity at this hour of the night, but the Secretary of State will see from Hansard that, apart from those brief moments of levity, there has been content to all our debates. The fact that he does not understand and does not care makes no odds because this wretched Bill will be a millstone around his and the Government's neck for years to come—and if he ever comes to the House with a Housing (Finance) Bill in anything like this kind of mess he will get exactly the same treatment and it will be equally well deserved.

It seems that, even now, the Secretary of State does not understand the full import of amendment No. 44 and our amendment (a) to it. I realise that he understands one point, although it has not really been mentioned in the debate. The reason why the Government do not like our amendment is that it will stop them fiddling the figures. If they managed to get enough public housing—whether from housing associations or local authorities—into some form of assured tenancy, they could then start describing those tenancies as private lets and try to claim that the number of private lets was on the increase. Yet we know that everything that the Secretary of State has said about reviving the private sector has been wrong so far. There are now 600,000 fewer homes available for rent in the private rented sector than there were eight years ago. That decline is now more steep than at any time since the 1957 abolition attempt.

The Secretary of State must deal with that failure. If he allows local authorities to keep properties, he cannot claim that the private sector is increasing. The rents of existing housing association tenants—and this is an important debate about rent levels—are set at fair rents determined by independent rent officers under the provisions of the Rent Act 1977. The Bill proposes that that regime should not apply to new housing association tenants, and in place of that protection future tenants will be part of the new deregulated system of assured tenancies at market rents that will apply to the private sector.

12.30 am

It is common ground between the Government and the voluntary housing movement that housing association rents should usually be lower than market rents. The Government have said that. They have also given public assurances—much as we may doubt their worth—that housing association rents should remain affordable for those in low-paid employment.

As my hon. Friends have said to great effect, the fact is that housing associations feel vulnerable. What the Government have managed to do—which no other Government, Tory or Labour, have achieved—is to divide the housing association movement. Some fear that their colleagues in other housing associations will be pressurised to move upmarket. In particular, the removal of Rent Act protection coincides with the introduction of a new financial regime for housing associations that will require them to raise money in the private market for new developments. With the present record level of house and land prices and the extremely high cost of borrowing, the National Federation of Housing Associations feels, probably rightly, that it is likely that housing associations will be under undue pressure to raise rents beyond the reach of low-income households. Yet the Government say that we must increase the supply of low-cost rented accommodation.

That is the source of conflict between the Secretary of State and the former Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine). The Secretary of State knows that more houses must be built for low-cost rent. The right hon. Member for Henley recognises that that means houses at the bottom of his garden. Yet neither of them is right. The problem is that the houses likely to be built in such circumstances are not likely to be for either low-cost rent or sale.

The NFHA has studied examples of housing association tenants in different sorts of accommodation. It has considered their actual income and the rents that they currently pay, set by the rent officer, and the rent that they would have to pay if the new mixed funding scheme was operating. It also considered how housing benefit would help. The results were quite frightening. They showed that tenants in low-paid work would be paying up to 41 per cent. of their low wages in rent, even after housing benefit. One of the examples that I gave not long ago at a press conference was of a nurse who, with the new pay rise, would lose about 40 per cent. of her salary in rent. That is what we are talking about tonight. That is why we are angry. In several cases housing benefit does not even begin to help until 40 per cent. of income disappears in rent. Housing benefit does not make rent affordable to low-income households.

The NFHA survey of new tenants—those who became housing association tenants this year—showed that their average weekly household income was £77·50. Where at least one person was in work, that rose to £115·64, just over half the national average of £224 a week. Housing association tenants overwhelmingly fall into the low-income category. Because of that, the NFHA argues that, on average, no more than one fifth of their income should be spent on rent. For a long time I have been arguing with many others that if an individual or family is paying more than one fifth of its income in rent or on a mortgage, it cannot do so for long without getting into serious economic trouble and other problems, including, in the worst examples, homelessness.

Housing charities need to be mindful of their charitable trusts which require them to provide for those in necessitous circumstances in terms appropriate to their means. For them, the purpose of their activities is not merely the provision of housing—private landlords do that—but the relief of poverty through the provision of affordable housing. That is what united the Labour and Tory parties in 1974 when we set up the housing associations. It is this Secretary of State who is dividing the House on that issue.

We should remember that 80 per cent. of housing associations are charities. Let us also remember that the Charity Commissioners are saying that it would not be a charitable act for housing associations to take over tenanted properties. Much as the DOE is leaning on them and trying to get them to change the ruling, every housing association knows that it must ask itself this question: if in the judgment of the Charity Commissioners it is not a charitable act to take over tenanted properties, why is it doing so? If the answer is that some bad management needs to be dealt with and the tenants want it, that is the only acceptable reason. Anything else smacks of financial opportunism and building a financial base, leading to the sort of situation that exists with companies where one large organisation bids for a smaller one to expand its financial or geographical base. That is what housing associations are worried about and why small associations fear the large predator companies.

There is no statutory backing for the Government's intention that rents should be affordable. The Bill abolishes the present statutory limitation to fair rent levels for new housing association tenants and puts nothing in its place, except the so-called tenants' guarantee, policed by the Housing Corporation. The guarantee's provisions are non-statutory and it is woefully weak on rent levels. It states of rents:

"Where accommodation has been provided with the assistance of a public subsidy, or purchased from a public body, such as a local authority or New Town, housing associations are expected to set and maintain their rents at levels within the reach of those in low-paid employment. This will often entail setting rents below market levels. Associations should not discriminate in their rent setting between tenants in receipt of housing benefit and others on below average incomes . . . In addition they are expected to take account of the size, amenities, situation and condition of the accommodation; and the need to cover the costs after subsidy, of loan charges, and management and maintenance including the requirement to make prudent provision for future repairs."

Those two requirements will conflict and, in certain areas, can lead to the assured tenancy rents being higher than market rents.

We have sought by previous amendments to strengthen the position of tenants. We want the Government to come up with some definition of affordability and to consult housing associations before doing so. They cannot go on passing the buck on rents back to housing associations when the grant levels they are offering imply massive rent rises.

The Secretary of State once said to me that he recognised that he had a problem in the south of England because of the high market rents. I said that, if he paid housing benefit that would enable people on lower incomes to pay market rents in the south, the bill would come to billions of pounds. That still would not solve the problem because of the tapers and cut-offs in housing benefit, and the Secretary of State knows that. That is why the Government have gone back on their assumption that they can increase housing benefit. They realised that if they did they would cost themselves billions of pounds without even beginning to address the problem in the south of England. That is the mess that they have got themselves into, but it pales into insignificance compared with the mess of the people who have to pay that bill.

That is why I have often said that we shall reintroduce rents set independently of the landlord, which means controls on rents. Not only would a Labour Government do that, but so will a future Tory Government because it will be impossible to use market rents without increasing housing benefit to the extent that the subsidy on housing benefit exceeds that of the subsidy to the person who is buying a house with mortgage interest tax relief. At present, the figure for that is about £5 billion. I do not believe that the Government will allow a £1 billion increase, let alone one of £5 billion. If that is right, the only course open to them is again to impose rent controls. The alternative would be rents that nobody could afford.

Housing association tenants include some of the poorest households in the country, as the National Federation of Housing Associations survey shows. It cannot be right to expect them to pay 30 or 40 per cent. in rent—in some cases more—from their already low incomes when they will have to pay rates, water charges and the poll tax. There must be some guidelines of affordability. This is an important matter and we shall divide the House on the amendment.

The House proceeded to a Division——

Mrs. Mahon (seated and covered): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was on my feet and wanted to speak before you called the Division. Labour Members saw that. I have been waiting to speak in the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have put the Question and we are in the middle of a Division.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to ask you a question about procedure during our deliberations on Lords amendments. On the previous batch of amendments there was a substantial and, I thought, reasoned debate setting out the position of the Opposition and of the Government. The Secretary of State intervened in the debate—no doubt he has the right to choose when to speak—and my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) responded.

The crucial rights in the House are not those of Front-Bench Members but those of Back-Bench Members, who must be able to defend the interests of their constituents. My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), who has been here for a long time—[Interruption.] She has certainly been here for far longer than the Conservative Members who are criticising her now. My hon. Friend got to her feet and tried to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because she wished to defend, as a Back-Bench Member should, the interests of her constituents.

I do not criticise you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but at that stage you decided to call the Division. Surely it is your job to protect the rights of Back-Bench Members——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is not for any hon. Member to lecture me about my job. As the hon. Gentleman fairly conceded, we had a thorough debate on that group of amendments. I must tell the hon. Gentleman that it is not for right hon. and hon. Members to decide when they take part in a debate. Members take part in a debate when they are called to do so by the Chair.

When the Secretary of State rose, no other hon. Member was trying to catch my eye. Therefore, I called the Secretary of State. Equally, when he sat down, only the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman was trying to catch my eye. Therefore, I called the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley). It seemed to me to be following the conventions of the House that, after adequate debate, the two Front-Bench spokesmen were winding up the debate. Therefore, at the conclusion of their remarks, I put the Question, consistent with the normal practices of the House.

I add that the question of who is called to speak in a debate is a matter for the discretion of the Chair.

Mr. Redmond: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will recall that last night, during the debate on the private Bill, you were standing outside the Chamber watching the proceedings. A Conservative Member walked into the Chamber and was immediately called to speak by the——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot comment or rule upon matters that occurred yesterday.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Now that you have called your Member of Parliament, perhaps you will allow me to help. There was a fairly lengthy debate on the previous group of important amendments. My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) is relatively new to the House and, as a member of a minority—[HON. MEMBERS: "What?"] She is one of the few women Members of the House. Since no women Members spoke in the debate, and since we were discussing housing, I should have thought that it would have been a good idea to give someone who is relatively new and who stood up after the two Front-Bench spokesmen a chance to put her views on housing in Halifax. I hope that in future discussions on the Bill you will keep an eye out for my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax and call her to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman will know that that was not a point of order, but it was a perfectly reasonable comment. I share his regret that the hon. Lady has not had a chance to take part in our proceedings, and I shall bear in mind his wish, as always, to be helpful.

Question accordingly negatived.

Lords amendment No. 44 agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That further consideration of Lords amendments be now adjourned. —[Mr. Ridley.]

1.14 am

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): The Government are again in a mess with their legislation, thanks to the obduracy of the Secretary of State for the Environment —principally—and the people responsible for this abysmal piece of legislation.

1.15 am

Tonight, the House has to consider 62 pages of more than 270 amendments, mainly emanating from the Government. I make it clear that we are perfectly willing, indeed keen, to continue debating the issues. We know that Conservative Members do not want those issues to be the subject of proper scrutiny or debate, because they are deeply embarrassed about their consequences for millions of families throughout the country.

We know also that matters such as a change of landlord by rigged or gerrymandered voting systems are not among those that the Government want rigorously examined. We know that the Bill's implications and the housing action trust proposals will affect not only thousands of families but whole neighbourhoods and communities. We know also that those proposals have caused misery, distress and uncertainty among communities the length and breadth of the country, and will continue doing so if the Bill is left unamended.

The Secretary of State for the Environment is in the process of hanging a second major albatross around the Government's neck. First there was the poll tax, and now the Housing Bill. It is something of a surprise that the right hon. Gentleman has quit so early in the discussions. After all, it was his well-known boast in the Committee Corridor when this legislation was being considered concurrently with the poll tax Bill that the Housing Bill was more interesting, principally because, as he claimed, he was the author of it. I hope that the Secretary of State's right hon. and hon. Friends are thinking about the quagmire into which he is again leading them.

That is bad enough. What is worse is the Bill's terrible consequences for families in council and private tenancies whom it will affect. I can understand the Secretary of State being miffed about what has happened, but what is more surprising is his apparent belief—of which he was able to convince his right hon. and hon. Friends—that somehow these matters would slide quietly through the House and that we would not be asking serious and searching questions about them.

I have every confidence in my hon. Friends' ability to ask all the questions. I have been here almost all evening, and the questions have been asked but have not been answered. We shall go on asking those questions until we are given the answers.

The Government have not made their intentions clear, but we suspect that there is a guillotine lurking round the corner. It is my hope—and I trust that Conservative Members have the good grace to share it with me—that we shall not see the abandonment on Friday of the promised debate on housing and homelessness in response to the Select Committee on the Environment's second report.

Mr. Trippier: We have had it.

Dr. Cunningham: The Under-Secretary says, "We've had it." Those may be prophetic words, because, judging by his performance so far, if anybody has had it, I guess that he has. He will be only the latest in a line of victims of the willingness of the Secretary of State to sacrifice others on the altar of his stupid ideas and ideological nonsense about how to handle housing and homelessness.

We want to continue the debate now, and we are opposed to the motion to terminate discussion.

Mrs. Mahon: I particularly wished to speak on amendment 44 and the amendment to it, amendment (a), and have been unable to do so. I wanted to speak even more after hearing the Secretary of State refuse yet again to answer points put by my hon. Friends. He treated the House with his usual contempt in his arrogant public-school manner, which I find offensive. My constituents, many of whom live on run-down estates and many of whom are elderly, have been caused the utmost anxiety by this dreadful Bill. They expect and deserve better. In my opinion, the Secretary of State and his Front-Bench team have shown themselves unfit to run even the smallest council.

Conservative Members have shown time after time their inability to understand the genuine concerns of people who need decent housing. Let me briefly run through the package of rights highlighted by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle), when the Secretary of State refused to answer.

Opposition Member after Opposition Member has pleaded for something to be done about security of tenure, but all we have been allowed is a very poor performance by the new Minister and no answers whatever. He does not understand what he is doing to people. The mark of a civilised society is the ability to house its people adequately, but the Minister does not even understand the dreadful consequences that the Bill will have.

I wanted to question the Secretary of State about affordable rents. Homelessness is increasing for many reasons, but one of them is quite simple: people on small incomes simply cannot afford soaring rents. When people do not have enough money at the end of the week to feed themselves and to pay the rent, something gives. People are being thrown out on to the streets, and this rotten Bill will throw out thousands more.

I also wanted to talk about other rights, such as the right of succession. Opposition Members wanted to discuss many more issues, but the debate has been deliberately stifled. Let me tell the Secretary of State that if he thinks that he has had it hot up to now, he has seen nothing yet. He is going to be buried in the misery that he is inflicting on the people of this country.

Mr. Cryer: I wish to speak against the proposal. For one thing, several members of the Liberal party are present. Normally they go home early, and now that we have got them here it seems appropriate to continue the debate and give them an opportunity to speak.

Secondly, the Secretary of State has been rather inconvenienced. I dare say that he may have been round at the American embassy last night, watching the election results. He is a bit overtired, and has decided that he cannot be bothered to take the Bill through the House tonight, so he will abandon it. It will not be abandoned for long, because the Secretary of State and his cronies will have it in mind to produce a guillotine. They will trample on the rights of Parliament to engage in proper debate. We are willing to examine the Bill in detail, to make our criticisms and to table amendments. We are here, willing and able to debate this noxious measure. If the Secretary of State and his cronies on the Treasury Bench decide to bring in a guillotine, everyone outside the House should know that the Labour Opposition were here, willing to debate for hour after hour, and if the Government make any cuts, they are deliberately curtailing debate in order to ride rough-shod with their seedy majority of estate agents and merchant bankers and get-rich-quick City people who will troop through the Lobby and get them their majority. It is very important that we should make the position absolutely clear.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) said, millions of people fear the legislation. They envisage their security of tenure being eroded and they envisage being treated by the Secretary of State as so many chattels to be sold along with whole council estates. They can envisage quangos being imposed on them.

It is surprising that the Secretary of State is not anxious to proceed with the Bill, as he has acted on it without the legislative authority of the House. He has appointed housing action trusts. The Bill has not been approved by the Houses of Parliament. What could be more offensive to the democratic process than for an ex-public schoolboy, thinking that he has got so far with the Bill, to carry it out although it has not been approved? It is surprising that the Secretary of State is ignoring the House and deploring procedure so that he can get a bit of shut-eye and get to a meeting with the Leader of the House.

Mr. Skinner: The Secretary of State does not want to get to a meeting. He has an appointment in the morning. He has to get the bag out again. He has to troop behind the Prime Minister who has a photo opportunity lined up somewhere in Green park. That is what he is up to. The Prime Minister's husband will be behind them because he is in the refuse disposal business as the deputy managing director of Attwoods. He is not satisfied with doing it on the cheap. He is going to organise a contract and have a gin and tonic with the board while settling the amount of money.

Mr. Cryer: My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is spot on. In addition, the Secretary of State will be having a meeting with the Leader of the House —they are having it right now—to decide what they will do to rescue the Bill.

I am particularly concerned to oppose the progress motion because I have had two meetings at Bierley estate, a big estate in my constituency. The tenants were outraged by the proposal. I went through every detail of the Bill, and they are particularly anxious about the voting proposals.

We want to know whether they plan to cheat the tenants out of the right to reject the proposals to flog off their homes to private landlords so that their position is clarified. They want to know whether the Government take the view that people who are away in hospital, on holiday or wherever should not be included in the voting rights because they will be counted as being against the proposal not to have private landlords. The people of Bierley estate and other estates are anxious. The people of Bierley estate and other estates in Bradford and every other city should know that when I was raising the question of tenants' right to vote, the Secretary of State walked out without providing an answer. In so doing, he treated the tenants of the estate with contempt. The Secretary of State has left the Chamber to consider another planning application in his backyard in Cirencester and Tewkesbury, thus showing his contempt for the people whom we represent.

1.30 am

The tenants of Bierley estate have produced a petition. I told them that this debate was taking place tonight. They held a vote, and voted overwhelmingly against their estate being sold off to private landlords. I wanted an opportunity to go through the petition in a debate and outline what my constituents think of the Secretary of State's proposals. I am being denied that opportunity.

I know what the Government have in mind: a three-hour guillotined debate. The tenants of Bierley and millions of others throughout the country will be denied the opportunity of having their opinions voiced by my hon. Friends due to the Government's chicanery, viciousness and use of the "Pickles" method of chopping debate.

The Tory councillors in Bradford say that council meetings are not secret, but do my hon. Friends know that, on 25 October, when they were discussing the sacking of 9,000 people, Tory councillors in Bradford turned off the microphones so that people in the public gallery could not hear what they were saying? The Chancellor of the Exchequer, too, prevented the public from hearing his remarks directly. He addressed them to journalists, whom he blamed for reporting them accurately. That will prove to be an albatross—there are a few here tonight—around his plump neck.

I want to express my outrage at the Government's shoddy tactics, employed to deny Opposition Members a first-class opportunity to discuss this Bill in detail. Let the tenants of Bierley know that I have mentioned their petition to all the smug Conservative Members sitting comfortably on the Treasury Benches, who are causing so much harm to working people and their families. They will know that our opportunity for debate has been curtailed by the Government.

My guess is that the Government will come trundling in with the Bill on Friday: we shall oppose it tooth and nail, just as, united, we oppose this attempt to curtail debate on this miserable, wretched, obnoxious measure, which should be consigned to the rubbish bin of history.

Mr. Pike: I speak against the motion to adjourn the debate. We should have a chance to debate the Bill. In July, I called it a shambles of a Bill, but that was too polite. It is a squalid, disgraceful Bill that fails to tackle any of the housing problems in so many parts of the country.

[Mr. Pike]

As my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said, we know that the Government will return with a guillotine that will deny us an adequate opportunity to debate the legislation's important provisions.

We must remember the history of the Bill's progress. It was not given enough time in Committee for proper debate, yet the Government massively amended it there —to such an extent that the Bill that emerged bore little resemblance to the Bill that went into Committee.

On Report, the Government again amended the Bill extensively. They did not allow us time to debate the amendments, and I well recall the evening when we called Division after Division because the guillotine had curtailed debate on many important proposals.

What has happened since then? A large number of amendments were tabled by the Government in another place, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) said earlier. But, once again, the Government are not prepared to allow time for this democratically elected House to debate the important implications of the Bill.

Mr. Home Robertson: Is my hon. Friend aware that this is an even greater shambles than he thinks? It is a composite shambles. At the moment we are debating legislation for England and Wales but we should presently have been coming to amendments to the Scottish housing legislation. The Housing (Scotland) Bill was supposed to have reached the statute book last week. Because the Government got that wrong too, and because they have already begun transferring public sector housing into the private sector in Scotland, there are five groups of amendments affecting Scotland before us tonight. The Government have brought civil servants down from Edinburgh to cover the debate. They will have to go home as a result of the motion to adjourn consideration and when we come back again——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that he is intervening and should not be making a speech.

Mr. Pike: I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) has made a valid point.

When discussing the Government's disgraceful move to stop democratic debate of the proposals we must take into account the fact that last week the Prime Minister was lecturing Poland on moves towards democracy. The Government repeatedly curtail democracy—in the House, in the trade unions and in local government.

On 14 July, I suggested to the Leader of the House at business questions that the Bill was a shambles and that if the Government really wanted to conduct the legislation properly, the honourable course would be to withdraw the Bill and introduce a new Bill in the new Session dealing with the country's housing problems. The right hon. Gentleman said that he knew that I was trying to help the Government. I again suggest that if he really wants to take the positive way forward and prevent further debate, the most acceptable solution would be to tell us that the Government are prepared to think again to withdraw the Bill and to bring back a Bill in the next, Session to deal properly with our housing problems.

Mr. Simon Hughes: This is an extraordinary Bill, and this extraordinary saga is likely to have an extrordinary conclusion. The Bill came before the House on 19 November last year. It was one of the first Bills that the Government introduced after the election. It was overtaken by many Bills on the way. It was overtaken because the Government had left bits out when they published it and they had to scrap the first edition and reprint it, and because it did not do what the Prime Minister thought it would do.

Two days before the election, the Prime Minister wrote to a tenant in south London explaining that the key part of the Bill, which allegedly gives tenants choice, would depend on a majority of tenants voting in favour of any proposal. A few months ago at Prime Minister's Question Time, I asked how the Prime Minister reconciled that with the fiddled voting system that appeared in the Bill. The Prime Minister said that, as far as she recollected, there was no fiddled voting system and that a majority of tenants was needed to support a proposed change of landlord. She got it wrong. Presumably it was pointed out to her that the Secretary of State and other Ministers had changed the system and produced a Bill with the most extraordinary voting system that we have ever known. The Education Reform Bill requires a majority of the parents voting to vote in favour before a school can opt out. This week the Government proposed an employment code, suggesting that a simple majority would not be a representative view from the work force and requiring a 70 per cent. majority. Yet in this Bill they first proposed a voting system whereby, in a block of 100, the decision to opt out could be taken by just one tenant voting in favour and 49 against. In a letter to me in August the Prime Minister referred to that system as "approval by informed acquiescence". A year after the Bill first saw light, although it was somewhat murky, the country now understands what that means. It means that those who say nothing are presumed to agree with the Prime Minister and to have no view of their own. The Prime Minister expects council tenants to behave like her Cabinet—if she says it will be done, it will be done. That is then called "tenants' choice". Eighty per cent. or more of my constituents are council tenants. What they understand to be the result of the Bill is not tenants' choice but tenants' fear—fear of having people they never chose taking over their homes without their consent and contrary to their wishes. That is not tenants' choice. It is Government diktat —from a Government who lecture others about dictatorship when, at home, they take choice away from the people whom they purport to represent.

There have been two further extraordinary events. There was a proposal that six areas of Britain should have their housing nationalised, taken over by Government quangos and then privatised, without any voting at all. The tenants were not to be allowed any say at all. It was not until the Under-Secretary of State—and the Secretary of State, who flies in and out of the Chamber according to how often his nicotine addiction gets the better of him and forces him to take additional health-reducing sustenance behind the Speaker's chair—went to meet the tenants that they realised that the tenants actually believed that they should have a say in whether their housing was to be taken over. At the last moment, the team who were at the Department when the Bill started having been reshuffled —the Minister of State was sent to the Foreign Office and the Under-Secretary of State back to Broxbourne—a member of the House of Lords who had never been elected by anyone and would probably not know a constituent if he saw one was released to meet the world on a Sunday programme and suddenly announced that tenants in housing action trust areas would have a vote after all. Twelve months on, the Government generously agree that tenants can have a say. My hon. Friends and I are here today in substantial numbers—[Interruption.] The Division records will show that more than two-thirds of our parliamentary party—the very good biblical number of 13—have been present because we believe that it is inappropriate for a Government who have taken a year to get this far suddenly to seek to postpone debate.

We want to debate housing action trusts and tenants' choice. We want to debate the amendments. Fifty three of the 62 groups of amendments selected by Mr. Speaker have not yet been debated. If the Government intend to end this Session with a guillotine on the Bill, which I understand will take three hours of debate, and then force through 53 groups of amendments in the remaining days of this Parliament, they might be advised to think again about how they could make their life just a little easier.

I shall give the Government a simple piece of advice —[HON. MEMBERS: Resign."] That is certainly an option that the Government are entitled to take. If they insist on staying in power and if they say that they actually understand that tenants are people with rights who should have a say, and that millions of people do not accept a fiddled voting system as one with any democratic authority, we should at least have the opportunity to improve what is a travesty of democratic legislation. Any attempt to steamroller it through the House will meet with as much resistance as it is possible to give. I sincerely hope that the Government have a deathbed repentence—repent now and die later.

1.45 am

Mr. Winnick: The Bill is crucial to many of our constituents because it removes protection in the private rented sector. Anyone who becomes a private tenant will be subject to market rents and his security of tenure will be limited. Obviously, we must be concerned about that. It is a crooked system. There is no other way to describe a system under which anyone who abstains is counted as being in favour of his accommodation being taken over by the private sector. Private landlords, even though they will be approved—for what that is worth—can take over any accommodation in our constituencies. There is no way that the local authority can say no. That is why there is so much anxiety.

It is only because of pressure throughout the country and the way that the tenants affected by the housing action trusts made clear their strong opposition that even this Government were forced to listen and, hence, there will be some sort of vote. But why was that not suggested in the first place? Why should those tenants have their properties taken over by quangos and then, in turn, by the private sector, without them being given any vote? So much for a Government who talk about democracy.

All those matters require as much debate as possible because they are crucial to our constituents. Quite a number of Conservative right hon. and hon. Members have vested interests in the Bill and are likely to profit from it. It would be interesting if they were to declare their interests before going into the Lobby.

Someone outside this House—he is not a Tory—has said that he is in favour of the Bill. I refer to Mr. Hoogstraten, one of the most notorious landlords in this country. He is a notorious crook who has been in prison. On a recent television programme he described his tenants as scumbags. There is no lesson that Rachman could have taught that man. When he was asked what he thought of the Bill, he said that it was a step in the right direction. The Bill is a step in the direction for every crook, for every unscrupulous person in the property market, for everyone who wants to make a fast buck and for everyone who wants to create misery and hardship. The Bill represents an advance for such people and they want it on the statute book.

I was a councillor in Brent when the Rent Act 1957 was put on the statute book. Despite all the housing problems there, we, the Labour-controlled council, took upon ourselves the added responsibility of rehousing people who were evicted lawfully under that legislation. All our predecessors' warnings about what would happen, the insecurity and exploitation turned out to be right. They knew what they were talking about. Rachman was not known in 1957, but by 1961 his name was known the length and breadth of the country. We warn today that there will be other Rachmans and Hoogstratens who recognise not only the sums that can be made from new lettings at a market rent, but the danger of private tenants who have protection. There will be every incentive for unscrupulous gangster landlords to get those tenants out because, when the accommodation becomes vacant, it can be relet at market rents.

The Bill is a disgrace. It will not do anything for the homeless, our constituents or young married couples who are desperate for accommodation but cannot afford a mortgage and live either in a rented room or with their in-laws. It will not help people in hardship. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said, there is not a Member of Parliament who does not have adequate housing. I have adequate accommodation and not one of us can claim housing hardship. Surely our constituents have as much right to it. That is why we oppose the Bill. It will not help them and in many ways it will make their position worse. It is a disgrace.

The Prime Minister goes to Poland and lectures the leadership there. If there is any lecturing to be done, it can come from people like us rather than from her. Time and again she uses the guillotine to ensure that Bills such as this are not adequately debated. The guillotine will fall on Friday or Monday and debates will be restricted on clauses which are of the utmost concern to our constituents.

The Bill is a disgrace and its handling has been a disgrace. We shall continue to fight it before and after it goes on the statute book. It is like the Tory 1957 Act. It is ammunition for gangsters and racketeers, and it is wholly opposed to everything that we believe in.

My hon. Friends may not be aware that when the 1957 Act was being repealed by the Labour Government who came to office in 1964—we promised to repeal it during the election—the Tory Opposition did not vote against the Labour legislation. The time will come when we form a Government and repeal this obnoxious legislation which will be so discredited that the Tory Opposition will do precisely the same. They will not vote against the legislation because we shall have been proved right, as our predecessors were 30 years ago.

Mr. Fraser: I am outraged by this abridgement of debate. Somewhere on your desk, Madam Deputy Speaker, is a letter that I sent to Mr. Speaker last Thursday saying that I wanted to speak about housing action trusts. I promised the occupants of 3,000 dwellings, who are part of a HAT, that I would try to say something on their behalf, but there will be little opportunity to do so if the motion is passed.

Those tenants have won a victory. At Question Time last Wednesday, I asked the Secretary of State whether he would accept a ballot by the tenants, but he dismissed the proposition arrogantly. We now have government not by Parliament but by Dimbleby, and on Sunday the Earl of Caithness told David Dimbleby that, contrary to what the Secretary of State told me last week, there would be a ballot by tenants. Although it is a victory, it is not sufficient. We should have preferred the Lords amendment to be passed, but at least it is some advance.

Coupled with the concession made on television on Sunday was a threat of blackmail to 3,000 HAT tenants in my constituency. They were told that if they did not vote for a HAT they would not receive a slice of the £192 million that the Government are allocating to HATs. If the Secretary of State had done that during a parliamentary election he would have been convicted of corrupt practices. He is engaging in blackmail and demanding with menaces by saying, "If you do not vote for a HAT you will not receive a share of the money." On the one hand, tenants are being asked to vote for the Secretary of State's proposals, but on the other for a denial of those funds and a continuation of damp and too much asbestos. They are being asked to choose between the Secretary of State and cockroaches. Some would say that that is a difficult choice to make, but there is a more serious side to this matter. Those 3,000 homes will not be any different whether they are in or out of a HAT. There will still be the same damp and the same lack of insulation. They will still need improvement and will not be sufficiently heated; some will need money spent on them.

My constituents want to explore with the Secretary of State the reason why they will be bribed to vote for a HAT or be denied access to the money. I have no doubt that they will vote against a HAT, but if the Secretary of State wants to save time he should remove part III of the Bill. Once there has been a ballot, HATs will be as dead as the dodo.

Mr. Skinner: My hon. Friend mentioned intimidation. We have just watched the Tory Chief Whip move from his corner seat and go to Madam Deputy Speaker to engage in intimidation against her to get a closure——

Madam Deputy Speaker Order. I assure the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) that no hon. Member intimidates me.

Mr. Fraser: I hope that the motion will not be passed and that we shall have an opportunity to discuss matters that affect about 6,000 of my constituents. No parliamentary announcement was made about the change of HATs; no parliamentary statement was made last week. The press office at the Department of the Environment had to be opened on Sunday afternoon after the David Dimbleby broadcast to save Ministers' faces by issuing a press notice.

Mr. Morgan: Perhaps the Government have announced a new principle of constitution—no television without representation.

Mr. Fraser: In the light of what has happened recently, no television without repression.

I protest that the chance to rehearse fully the arguments that my constituents in HATs have asked me to advance has been curtailed. I shall vote with all the strength that I can against the motion.

Mr. Tony Banks: I do not think that any Opposition Member would believe for a moment that the Government are democrats. They are not democratic in the way in which they operate. They abuse the rights of the House as they abuse our citizens. We understand that, but we cannot take the hypocrisy of all this. We know, as does everyone else involved in housing, that the Bill will not provide one additional unit of accommodation. It is nothing to do with the housing crisis; it is all about the Conservative party's ideology. The Conservatives hate local authorities providing housing and they will do everything they can—the Bill is part of that strategy—to eliminate the provision of housing by local authorities. We have the evidence of the Government's words and of our eyes when we see their actions.

2 am

We deplore the Bill. It is a lousy, rotten Bill, as my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) said. The people know that. It is impossible for us to stomach the Government's hypocrisy. They are altering the basis of public sector tenancies. They hope to hand large swathes of council tenants into the hands of the Hoogstratens and the nasty gangster landlords who are waiting for the Bill to get on to the statute book. We want the opportunity to expose the bankruptcy of the Government's case, and we need time to do that.

The Government are clearly in a mess. Although I found the Bill iniquitous in the extreme, I had some pleasure in being the agency Whip who was brought back to do his little bit to stall its passage towards the statute book. The Conservative Benches have sometimes been full of Members and sometimes almost empty, but no one has been prepared to answer our case. They just want to steamroller the Bill through Parliament. They want to steamroller the rights of Parliament.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I agree with all that my hon. Friend has said, especially about local authorities and reasonable rents. Does he agree that it would be in the interests of many Government supporters to follow the Bill because its purpose is not just as my hon. Friend has described it but is to raise the general costs of housing for everyone, including private tenants, to make the housing market equal to the market in everything else, and therefore to put up the cost of housing relative to anything else and to be inflationary, which is contrary to the Prime Minister's claimed objectives? That is the degree of the cunning of the Conservatives who are not there tonight.

Mr. Banks: As ever, my hon. Friend is correct. If we had had a proper debate which continued throughout today, he could have made those points. It appears that we shall be denied the opportunity to hear him.

My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) said that the Bill will be an albatross around the neck of the Secretary of State. I shall not go all the way through it, but I remind the House of the first few lines of Coleridge's "The Ancient Mariner" :

> "It is an ancient Mariner,
> And he stoppeth one of three.
> 'By thy long grey beard and glittering eye,
> Now wherefore stopp'st thou me?'"

I shall stop there because, although one may think that the Secretary of State resembles the ancient mariner, he has neither a beard nor a glittering eye. If there were any glitter in one of those eyes which showed any humanity, we would know that it was a glass eye. The Bill will be an albatross around his neck and we shall hang it there.

Mr. Boateng: The Secretary of State is now with us. [HON. MEMBERS: "In body."] During the time that you have been out of the Chair, Madam Deputy Speaker, you have missed a rather interesting, not to say macabre, phenomenon surrounding the person of the Secretary of State.

To outline it briefly, what has happened is that there have been unpleasant manifestations of political will on the Government Benches. As soon as such manifestation has taken place—the most recent of them is the desire of those who sit on the Government Benches to curtail the debate—the Secretary of State disappears and melts into the background, one knows not where. One suspects that he goes somewhere to revitalise his vital forces. He goes away—dematerialises—and then, some time later, manifests himself once again on the Government Benches. That has happened time after time throughout the debate.

Why should that be? The answer may lie in one aspect of this noxious Bill that we are being denied the right to discuss this evening—housing action trusts, the method by which they will come into existence and the way in which properties can be transferred from the trusts into the hands of private developers.

The question that Ministers were unable to answer during earlier deliberations on the Floor of the House and in Committee is precisely the role of the dead in the voting. Any understanding of how this manifestation of the public will is to take place makes it quite clear that for the first time ever the dead will be given a vote. For the first time ever the dead will be seen positively to acquiesce——

Mr. Simon Hughes: It will be informed acquiescence.

Mr. Boateng: Yes. There will be informed acquiescence on the part of the dead. When it is viewed in that rather macabre light, the disappearance and then the reappearance, or manifestation once more, of the Secretary of State becomes that much more clear.

Mr. Hughes: We have always known that the Prime Minister believes that she has great power when communicating with the living. This is an extension of her belief in her new spiritual or supernatural prowess.

Mr. Boateng: That is indeed so, and the Secretary of State is the cat on her broomstick. Our fear is that the Secretary of State is among the undead—the living dead. Once one has made that vital conceptual leap, his appearances and disappearances during the debate become totally explicable.

Mr. Skinner: Where do these series of macabre incidents take place? Would I be right to assume that they take place in Finchley at a Westminster council cemetery? What is the charge for witnessing these scenes? Is it 5p, or is it £2 million? Who is on the gate? Is it Lady Porter? Is she in charge? Is my hon. Friend aware that the reason the Government intend to close the debate shortly is that there is a Cabinet meeting in the morning—well, some people call it a Cabinet meeting but others call it the "Spitting Image" show.

Mr. Boateng: A "Spitting Image" show—or a seance? Which is it?

There is a way of determining the undead. In the absence of a silver bullet, and not wishing to descend to the level of a stake through the heart, one is driven to a time-honoured process. In this I have been greatly assisted by my hon. Friend the Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), who has provided me with a mirror. All that I need do is to put this picture of the Secretary of State in front of the mirror. If it does not immediately manifest itself in the mirror, the Secretary of State is truly of the undead. Madam Deputy Speaker, there is no image in the mirror.

But I digress slightly from this serious debate. Housing action trusts are a fundamental denial of democratic rights. They are the very negation of the people's right to choose. Of late, we have heard much from the Prime Minister about the people's right to choose. She went to Poland and lectured General Jaruzelski. In breathy tones, she said, "You know, people ought to be able to make vital choices that affect their lives. They ought to be able to make those choices. And do you know what we have found when we give them the opportunity to make those choices? Well, normally, you know, people make the right choice." That is what the Prime Minister said in Poland; why does she not give that right to the people who live on estates in this country? When she does, we can have a little more confidence in the assurances given to us by Ministers.

The Government do not trust the people. They will not allow an open debate on this vital issue. As long as they continue to deny us the opportunity to debate the Bill, they must recognise that we shall push the matter here and in the country at large. We shall fight this Bill from here to Halifax.

2.15 am

Ms. Primarolo: When the Bill was introduced by the former Minister for housing and Planning, the hon. Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), it was heralded as the most radical housing Bill this century. The offensive tactics that the Government have used as the Bill progressed through Committee, Report stage and the other place were certainly radical. It is strange that the Government are surprised that we oppose the Bill so vigorously. They are trying to reverse an important principle that was enshrined many years ago in the Housing Acts of Addison and Wheatley—that housing should be provided on the basis of need, at a reasonable cost, and that profit should not be made from that provision. It should be a social provision. The Bill would completely undermine that principle.

[Ms. Primarolo]

The Government have been creative in the provision of information to the public about what has happened in Parliament. They have not always told the truth. On 6 November, on the programme "On the Record", which seems to be more effective in obtaining answers from the Government than anyone else, the Earl of Caithness—under pressure—promised twice in the interview that tenants transferring into housing action trusts would have the right to vote and that a simple majority would suffice. That has not happened. We are told that many of the amendments are technical, but examination of the Official Report of the other place reveals that there was no debate of some amendments. Among the amendments which we have been denied the right to debate tonight are those in the group headed by Lords amendment No. 92. They are classed as technical, but they could be used to asset-strip local authorities as some of their housing stock could be forcibly removed. We have been denied the opportunity to question the Minister on those amendments which hitherto have been moved formally and not explained.

The Government are attempting to face both ways when it comes to what they consider democratic. All but the most partisan—unfortunately, the deliberately partisan have a majority in the House—regard the Government's proposals as undemocratic and unprincipled. The Government have confirmed us in that belief time and again by denying us the right to explore what is going on.

The Government have proposed a curious voting system. As my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) said, the dead and those who do not vote are deemed to have voted in favour of a transfer. The Government call it the inertia vote. [Interruption.] They gave reasons for it. In a quite different document, the Government talk of a new model active citizen——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The House is showing great discourtesy to the hon. Lady.

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I think that the noise may be the result of hon. Members' concern that an obscene picture has been laid on the Table of the House. Hon. Members wonder whether the Secretary of State has been nipping out during the debate to examine the document.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms. Primarolo) should be heard by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Ms. Primarolo: Thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker. The document on the active model citizen talks of the interventionist role of individuals to improve the lot of their neighbours. That does not square with the proposal for an inertia vote. Indeed, inertia voting goes against the principle of natural justice. The Government, however, are denying us the right to question them on that.

Mr. Spearing: My hon. Friend has told us that the Earl of Caithness made a statement on television about voting for potential HAT tenants. It seems that that which featured in the earl's statement has not appeared on the Amendment Paper and that the Government are not proceeding with it. There are two members of the Cabinet on the Treasury Bench, and if they wished to intervene I am sure that my hon. Friend would be prepared to give way to allow them to do so. Is it not high time, even during the debate on the motion, for them to tell us whether there is a reason for the Government choosing not to proceed with that which the Earl of Caithness described on television? Surely they should explain what will happen. If the guillotine does not provide sufficient time for an explanation to be given at a later date, there is sufficient time now. Or is this yet another example of a Minister saying something to the media—this time in public—that is not being carried out in practice?

Ms. Primarolo: The Government do not intend to give us the truth about the Bill, and that is the purpose of the motion. They will not engage us in debate. The occupants of the Treasury Front Bench have not moved, and it is clear that even at this late stage they will not come clean.

The Bill makes no provision, suggestions or proposals. We have not been convinced by any arguments that we have heard to date that have sought to explain why the Government are so passionately committed to the principle that private accommodation and private landlords will provide accommodation and correct the problems of homelessness and poor accommodation. The Government need to be reminded that council housing exists because of the failure of the private sector to house the people.

As a new Member, I suffer occasionally from the delusion that the purpose of being here is to debate, discuss, question, clarify and express the points of view of those whom we represent. During the passage of the Bill the Government have shown nothing but contempt for the electoral process, the rights of the people to housing and the rights of hon. Members to question and challenge them. Is it true that we no longer have the accountability of Ministers in the House? Whenever they do not want to answer a question, they move the closure, suspension and a timetable motion. That is what they have done throughout our discussions on the Bill. It is a disgrace. How dare they talk to us about giving people choice when they do not give Members of this place the right to choose what to question them upon?

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. David Waddington) rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Question put, That the Question be now put:—

Hospital Service, Leicestershire

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dorrell.]

2.47 am

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): In September, the Leicestershire health authority put forward a series of drastic proposals for public consultation. They affect all hon. Members with Leicestershire constituencies, and I have already advised you, Madam Deputy Speaker, and my hon. Friend the Minister, that any Leicestershire Member who seeks to catch your eye will have my agreement to take part in this short debate.

Before that, I record the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell). As a Whip, he is not allowed to speak but I know of his tremendous commitment to the Health Service in his constituency. The hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) and my hon. Friend the Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) are away from the House on important business, but have sent their good wishes; my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) is, alas, unwell and awaiting an operation, but he has always been a tower of strength in lobbying for Leicestershire and he telephoned his good wishes from his sick bed.

The health authority is short of cash, especially the extra money needed to open phase 2 of the new Glenfield district hospital in 1990-91, and phase 4 of the Leicester royal infirmary in 1991-92, together with two small schemes in Loughborough and Hinckley. Those schemes alone will produce a deficit of more than £4 million. If the authority proceeds with other desirable improvements the deficit will be nearly £8 million, and by 1994, if nothing is done, it will have risen to £21 million.

The authority is trying to achieve savings by completely closing eight hospitals, transferring some wards between the various city hospitals and closing all four rural maternity units. Two of the hospitals scheduled for closure —Framland and Catmose Vale—and two of the maternity units—at St. Mary's, Melton Mowbray, and at Rutland memorial hospital—are in my constituency.

Leicestershire health authority has long been underfunded. When I was a new Member in 1974 Leicestershire received only 75 per cent. of national average NHS funding. With all the other county and city Members of Parliament at that time I went to see Mrs. Barbara Castle, the then Secretary of State. We urged her to improve Leicestershire's share of national resources and to permit the proposed new Glenfield hospital, at that time threatened with the axe, to be built. As a result of sustained all-party pressure and the good effect of the resource allocation working party, Leicestershire now gets 96 per cent. of the NHS national average, which is still not enough, but better than 75 per cent. The new Glenfield general hospital has been open for a couple of years, and funding phase 2 of it constitutes part of our financial problem.

I am delighted to see my hon. Friend the Minister here, even at 2.48 am, but I must press her, first, to defend the RAWP formula. It is essential to Leicestershire, and we must proceed to 100 per cent. average funding as quickly as possible. Some people, perfectly honourably, have suggested mothballing the new Leicester units. I cannot support that, having pressed for almost 15 years for them to be built. Many of my constituents will benefit from them. I press my hon. Friend to ensure that some of the new money announced for the NHS by the Chancellor in his autumn statement be urgently directed to Leicestershire to help it cope with its immediate cash crisis.

Several of the hospitals scheduled for closure were announced as long as over three years ago in the authority's 1985 strategic plan. Both Framland and Catmose Vale hospitals in my constituency are old hospitals. Splendid care of the elderly takes place at both units and I pay tribute to the staff. However, I do not oppose their closure, and nor do many of my constituents. We merely demand that some of the large sums released from the sale of the land be ploughed back into adequate provision of extra beds for the elderly in other hospitals in Melton and Oakham and into really effective community care. It will not be adequate to rely solely upon the private nursing homes, although they have an important part to play, and it will be wholly unsatisfactory to take maternity beds at the Rutland memorial hospital for the purposes of geriatric care. Rutland people expect additional provision to be made for the elderly at Rutland memorial hospital, with the use of some of the money from the sale of Catmose Vale, as was specifically promised in the 1985 strategy document. The elderly patients and the splendid staff deserve better than the health authority's present proposals, which seem ill thought out and inadequately related to the local needs of elderly people, who need to be visited by their families and friends.

Let me deal with the shameful proposal to close the rural maternity units at Oakham and Melton Mowbray. In my view, this proposal shows a complete lack of concern for the wishes of ordinary people in rural areas. In 1987, there were 296 maternity beds in seven hospitals throughout Leicestershire, providing for 10,789 deliveries. The new proposal is for 220 beds in two hospitals, both in Leicester city, for 11,000 deliveries, with the remaining five units being closed down.

That is the mentality of the NHS production line: grab them in and shove them out again and never mind about the wishes of the mother and the family. Those crude proposals have aroused immense anger in my constituency —anger that I share. They are dressed up as being good for mother and baby, allegedly because the birth will take place in a modern, hi-tech general hospital. The proposals ignore the fact that the two units are safe and friendly and, above all, accessible to women living in rural areas.

The NHS has been closing rural units for far too long. I can best illustrate that point with a personal example. My eldest son James, who is nearly 13, was born in November 1975 in Corby maternity unit, four miles from my home in Gretton. My younger son Richard, who is 9¾, was born in Kettering general hospital, 13 miles away, in February 1979 because the Corby maternity unit had closed in the intervening years. My wife went into labour with Richard, my younger son, in the middle of a massive snowstorm. The ambulance just got her out of my village before lunch, and she was the last person out of the village that day. I could not get out because I had to look after James at home. I did not see Richard until 24 hours after he was born and the roads had been cleared by snow ploughs.

That is the miserable prospect that awaits my constituents—except that the distance from some of the Rutland and Vale of Belvoir villages to Leicester is over 30 miles, often along poor roads and perhaps in fog, ice or snow. No, thank you very much. That simply is not tolerable, and I will not let it happen, especially when any financial saving from such closures would be negligible, and the inconvenience, expense and worry for my constituents quite unacceptable.

I have great personal affection and respect for my hon. Friend the Minister. I shall make her an offer that she cannot refuse. If she wants my support for her conduct in the House of the NHS she will tell Leicestershire health authority here and now that the rural maternity units must be saved. If she does not, I promise her that I will make her ministerial life a misery until the units are saved. My constituents are simply not to be treated in that cavalier and unreasonable manner by the health authority. My hon. Friend the Member for Harborough has said the same. He has told the authority of his complete opposition to the closure of the maternity unit at Market Harborough cottage hospital. His wisdom, experience and knowledge of his constituents over nearly 30 years in the House deserve respect.

Finally let me say a word to the Leicestershire health authority, to which I shall also make an offer that it cannot refuse. I have a letter from the chairman, Mr. George Farnham, who is an old and valued friend of mine. It is a stick of political dynamite, and I intend to explode it now. He wrote to me 14 months ago on 8 September 1987, referring to maternity services in Melton and Rutland:

> "There is no question in my mind or in the minds, to the best of my knowledge, of our Gynaecologists about the retention of the peripheral maternity units; they will be retained as presently constituted. I hope this puts your mind at rest on this matter."

Mr. Farnham is a man of honour. I am sure that he will now tell his colleagues and staff in the health authority that the proposals cannot proceed. The maternity units must be saved forthwith and the battle should be won tonight.

I now invite other hon. Members from Leicestershire briefly to express their constituency concerns.

2.56 am

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) for the opportunity to take part in the debate. I congratulate him on the impressive stand that he took in the debate on the imposition of charges for eye and dental tests which we both agree will deny many people, especially the elderly, the right to medical services.

It is appropriate that we should discuss the Health Service in Leicestershire because a sickness is spreading through it. The root cause is, of course, resources. When my day began at 9.30 am yesterday I attended, with many mothers and babies from the constituencies of the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton and the hon. Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby), who is also present in the Chamber, a lobby of the health authority in Princess road, Leicester. The object was, of course, to protest against the closure of the eight hospitals. Two have already been mentioned. The others are the Ashby and district hospital, Blaby hospital, Fielding Johnson, Higham Grange centre, the Regent hospital and the Roundhill maternity home. When one adds to those the proposed closures of wards at Groby road and Leicester general hospital in my constituency and the possible closure of the Towers hospital in 1992, one realises that the Health Service in Leicestershire is in crisis.

I pay tribute to the work that has been done by parents and staff and by unions such as NUPE and COHSE to oppose the closures. There are currently 8,500 people on the hospital waiting list in the Leicestershire district. There are 600 people waiting for orthopaedic operations; and it will take 60 full days of surgery to clear the urgent list, the only definition of urgency in such cases being that of indescribable pain. In Leicestershire it takes months or even years to get a hearing aid approved and fitted.

The morale of staff at local hospitals is at an all-time low. On Saturday 12 nurses came to my surgery at the Coleman neighbourhood centre. Sister Sandra Burgin has been working for more than 20 years as a theatre sister at the general hospital. Last week her managers announced to her that she would be receiving a pay rise of 38p per week. She says that that is a disgrace, and I agree. Ancillary workers at the hospital are being denied a pay rise of just £1·50 per week. The Government have robbed the Leicestershire health authority of more than £20 million in the past five years, and it will be a further £8 million short this year.

So far, 34 right hon. and hon. Members have signed my early-day motion opposing the closure of the eight hospitals. It must be pointed out, however, that the health authority still wastes a great deal of money. For example, in the general hospital in my constituency the health authority has decided to undertake a scheme called QED, resulting in hundreds of large red feet stickers being spread all over the hospital in an attempt to save money. That scheme has cost several thousands of pounds.

We all know where the blame lies and who is responsible. We know who has betrayed the county and who has robbed the people of Leicestershire of a decent Health Service and turned it into a jumble sale. I gave notice before the debate informing the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), that I should be talking about him. I describe his attitude and conduct as hypocritical. Blaby hospital is in his constituency, but he has not lifted a finger to prevent its closure. This morning a petition of 10,000 signatures was presented to save the hospital.

Last week in the House of Commons the Chancellor promised £2 billion for the Health Service. I should like to know what will be Leicestershire's share. The Chancellor should be ashamed of himself because, as a Leicestershire Member of Parliament, he has taken part in a conspiracy to deny the people of Leicestershire their fair share of services. We want the cash, and we want it now.

3 am

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) for initiating this debate.

We have just heard something of a political tirade from the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz). He was not a Member in 1983 and so would not remember the hard work of my hon. Friends the Members for Rutland and Melton, for Harborough (Sir J. Farr), for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell), the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) and myself to ensure that Leicestershire received a fair share of the national RAWP average. It was down to 92 per cent. and the position was acute. It is now up to almost 97 per cent. That is not good enough—we want 100 per cent.—but there has been a definite improvement. I am grateful to all those who worked so hard to achieve that.

We can appreciate the difficulties in which the Leicestershire health authority finds itself. In 1979 it had old hospitals, but all plans were put on the shelf because the previous Government had failed to provide sufficient funding for the NHS. Leicestershire health authority was desperate. It had to dust the plans off the shelf and try to provide the services that Leicestershire needed. It did not have sufficient acute services. Since 1984 there has been £18 million of new investment and a vast increase in the services required, above and beyond those that could be readily appreciated. As a result, the health authority is in some difficulty. It is not of its own making or that of the Government; it is simply a fact.

There has been enormous investment in Leicestershire, and we should be grateful to the Government for that. Leicestershire has centres of excellence. If I were to be desperately ill, I would rather be ill in Leicestershire than anywhere else. A new hospital was opened recently at Coalville. It provides much-needed services for the elderly. Because the population is becoming older, there is a need for those services. The hospital includes what I believe to be a very important service, the general practitioner beds. They are vital to the community. Many families who look after elderly relatives need some relief for a short time. Often one elderly person looks after another who is seriously ill, and he needs to have a few days break every six weeks or so.

Although I am pleased about the opening of Coalville hospital, it has placed the Ashby district hospital at risk. It has been in existence for more than 100 years and is very much loved. It has a maternity unit, but the difficulty is that there are only 3·4 births per week in the unit. Bed occupancy is only 33 per cent. Only easy births take place there; difficult births take place at the royal infirmary. The average stay is five days. I have spoken to the experts—not the doctors, but the nurses who run the unit—who say that they can never predict whether a birth will be easy or difficult. One in 10 is difficult and the patient has to be rushed to a major hospital. The nurses feel that the mothers are too much at risk. That is just one view and there are others. Mothers say, "Mothers are entitled to choose", but it is often those who have had an easy birth who say that. Those who had a difficult birth say, "Thank goodness we have these centres of excellence in Leicestershire."

Those are the two sides of the argument, which is a sad one. We must look at the overall picture and appreciate the difficulties of the area health authority. We must stress that it is providing excellent NHS facilities for the critically ill for the whole of Leicestershire.

3.5 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mrs. Edwina Currie): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) on winning the ballot. He takes a great interest in the welfare of his constituents and health care nationally. I took seriously his threat to make my life a misery, but I have to tell him that so long as I hold this great office of state and see daily many marvellous examples of good care in the NHS and outside, my life is a joy and nothing that he can do can dent it, even at 3 am.

I welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West (Mr. Ashby) who is my neighbour. I join in his delight at the new Coalville hospital which has been welcomed and enjoyed by his constituents. I hope to see it before too long. I am sorry that our hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr) is unwell and I hope that my hon. Friends will convey to him my good wishes for a successful treatment and speedy recovery. If there is anything that I can do to help I should be glad to make myself useful, but I am sure he is being extremely well looked after at home.

I also note the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Loughborough (Mr. Dorrell) in his place on the Front Bench. That surprises me because I have in front of me the profile of Leicestershire district health authority produced by my Department and dated 31 October 1988 in which he, with his majority of 17,648, is recorded as a Labour Member. I think that that is a mistake and I am glad to have his support tonight.

I note also what the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) has said and shall comment on his points as I proceed.

Trent regional health authority has benefited enormously from Government policy in recent years, as all present acknowledge. Ten years ago, when the party which the hon. Gentleman supported and probably still supports was in power, the authority was receiving £369 million. Last year it rose to just over £1 billion—an increase of about 14 per cent. in real terms—and Trent's initial cash allocation for this year was increased by 6·3 per cent. to over £1,050 million, which is well above the national average increase of 5·7 per cent. That shows both how much we care about the region and the tremendous improvement, particularly in the position of the regional health authority in relation to RAWP.

As I said on Monday night when my hon. Friend the Member for Derbyshire, West (Mr. McLoughlin) was drawing attention to issues on health care also covered by Trent regional health authority:

> "We should not underestimate the impact of the Trent regional health authority or of the National Health Service generally on local life. More than 660,000 in-patients were cared for in Trent hospitals last year and total employment in the regional health authority stands at about 75,000 whole-time equivalent staff. The amount of money contributed to the local economy by the health authority is considerable."—[Official Report, 7 November 1988; Vol. 140, c. 149.]

Leicestershire health authority is the biggest district in the country. It looks after a population of about three quarters of a million. It is a major centre for teaching and health care. It looks after about 100,000 in-patients a year and nearly 600,000 out-patients, with over 12,000 staff. In the past four years there has been an increase of more than 500 in front-line manpower—doctors and nurses. That is hardly the picture of misery that was painted by the hon. Gentleman. This year its capital allocation, for example, plus estimated income from the sale of land, will come close to £20 million.

When I became a Member of Parliament, Leicestershire heath authority was receiving £116 million a year. Last year it was £162 million and this year it is £177 million, which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West said, demonstrates the improvement in service and funding. Indeed, it gives the lie to what the hon. Gentleman said. So much for Government robbery. If that is robbery, most local people would rather have more of it than less. The development of services in Leicestershire was described in the strategic review which Leicestershire health authority recently produced. I understand that it is out for consultation, so hon Members will realise that I am constrained in what I can say.

In 1984, the health authority started thinking about future services. The strategic plan was approved following wide public consultation and published in 1985. A number of the health authority's present plans were not in the plan published in 1985. The intention is to provide a first-class acute specialist service from three general hospitals—the Leicester Royal infirmary, Leicester general and Glenfield hospital, which are all in Leicester—but at the same time to redevelop smaller hospitals around the county into a series of community hospitals mainly concentrating on the care of elderly people, in which the growth of need is likely to be sharpest in the next few years.

I heard what my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton said about geriatric services, but we cannot escape the fact that there will be a rapid increase in the number of elderly people. They will increasingly need our help in the future.

In the short time that I have left I shall concentrate on maternity care. I heard what my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton said about maternity care, but I hope that he will think that his criticism of the big hospitals was somewhat over the top. I shall not rehearse my obstetric history, but I had both my children at a major teaching hospital in the midlands, and I am glad that I did. I was booked as a low-risk mother, as most people with my background and housing would have been. I was not low risk and experienced problems, and I was extremely glad that everything was on tap. My baby was delivered in a slightly less than usual way, but she is fine. Had I had these problems elsewhere, we might have formed part of the statistics to which I shall refer in a moment. Throughout the country, hundreds of women receive excellent care in the major hospitals and it is not appropriate to infer that because a hospital is big it cannot give kindly care or that the quality of care is diminished. I hope that that is not the case, and I am certain that it is not in Leicestershire.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire, North-West drew attention to something that is of significance in the papers prepared for consultation by the district health authority. The number of occupied beds for maternity care at Ashby hospital in the year ended 31 March 1988 was 5·9. That is quite a reasonable occupancy, but it suggests that there is a gap. At Roundhill there are 30 beds, of which 15 are unused, and the number of occupied beds is only 6·1. At St. Mary's, Melton, there are 10 beds, of which only five are used. At Rutland Harborough there are eight beds, of which three are used. At Loughborough there are eight beds, of which six are used. By "used", I mean the average number of occupied beds. The number of births per bed per year in those hospitals in 1987 ranges between about 32 or 33 at St. Mary's, Melton, and 11 at Market Harborough.

I accept that in the strategic plan, the four small hospitals—particular reference has been made to the GP maternity beds—were regarded as remaining in use until the end of the planned period. My hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton was right to draw attention to that, but it should be noted that the health authority decided in May 1987, following consultation and with agreement, that the total number of GP maternity beds in Market Harborough, Oakham and Melton Mowbray should be reduced from 56 to 31 in view of the significant under-use. The rate of use of some of those beds after that reduction is still less than half. Their main use is for out-patients, and that will remain so. Wherever babies are being born in Leicestershire, they are not, on the whole, being born in the small maternity units.

I am told that ante-natal care will be provided at each of the four hospitals and the accommodation released is intended for a variety of uses, most of which will require accommodation for geriatric patients, additional support services and out-patient clinics.

In a question to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton said that he wanted no generalities and expected "to hear that the proposals to close all rural maternity units have been dropped?"—[Official Report, 3 November 1988; Vol. 139 c. 1189.]

The proposal has not been dropped. The health authority has not finished consultation on the matter. The proposal has not come before Ministers. That will probably happen next spring, but only if there is failure to agree locally. Whatever decision is taken it will be in the interests of the patients, and that includes unborn children. I carry the burden of knowing that 45 women in the United Kingdom died in childbirth last year. Although we announced yesterday that we have the lowest infant death rate on record, in comparison with other countries Britain has a worse record. The death rates in other countries of tiny babies have tended to fall faster.

I am grateful for this opportunity to listen to the views of my hon. Friends. The debate has shown again their interest in their constituents. I hope that they will take on board that we are trying to provide the best service that we can. I hear the commitment that my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton has made to the small maternity units and we shall ensure that his views, those of his constituents and other hon. Members are taken into account.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing (Relined Flues)

1. Mr. A. Cecil Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many flues in houses owned by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive have been relined during the past five years; and what is the projection of numbers for the period up to 31 March 1990.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Richard Needham): The chairman of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive tells me that records exist only for the last four years, during which 11,157 flues were relined in specific upgrading programmes. A further 4,285 are expected to be relined by the end of March 1990. Other relinings are carried out in comprehensive improvement programmes, but separate figures are not available.

Mr. Walker: I thank the Minister for that reply, but he must be aware that many people have purchased their Housing Executive homes through Government encouragement. Is he aware that, unfortunately, many of those people have defective chimneys due to the flawed rubber sausage method which is used to repair defective flues? As many people are financially unable to have those defects remedied, I ask the Minister, especially in the interests of health, to agree to have those chimneys repaired, either by direct labour or by grant-aid.

Mr. Needham: As much as I should like to help the hon. Gentleman's constituents with the problems caused by their flues, the fact is that they bought the houses from the Housing Executive. If they bought the houses under conditions which were not for any particular reason made clear to them, they can of course take legal action, as I believe some already have. However, the principle of caveat emptor has to be maintained and, of course, it is really up to the purchaser to sort out the matter with the Housing Executive.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Will the hon. Gentleman keep in mind the great hardship that occurs when this alteration is carried out, as many people have had to leave their homes because of the state of their bedrooms and living-rooms? The workmanship has not been of the best standard in many instances. Will he urge the Housing Executive, when it alters the remaining flues, to ensure that proper facilities are provided while the alteration is carried out, and that compensation for the loss of furniture, carpets, curtains and facilities is paid quickly and properly?

Mr. Needham: I shall, of course, bring the hon. Gentleman's points before the chairman of the Housing Executive. I am sure he will agree that everything possible should be done to make certain that the tenants are adequately looked after while those operations are undertaken. I should say, perhaps, that the cost involved is £600 to £700. Although I realise that it is an imposition, it is still a fairly small amount of money in comparison with the value of the home.

Mr. Beggs: Will the Minister confirm that the Northern Ireland Housing Executive was responsible for the original design of the flues installed in these houses? Are thousands of houses in my constituency having flues relined because there was an inherent design fault in the original system, and are people at risk for as long as those defective flues are not repaired?

Mr. Needham: It is because the flues are defective that the Housing Executive is undertaking this programme throughout its stock—as quickly as possible. If, of course, the Housing Executive is at fault because of the design, the owners or tenants should take it up with the Housing Executive or go through the courts.

Integrated Education

2. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the progress made in the development of integrated education and the education for mutual understanding project over the past six months.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Dr. Brian Mawhinney): Within the past six months three integrated schools have been granted maintained status and a new integrated school has been opened and provisionally registered as an independent school.

The planned education reforms in Northern Ireland will include a range of significant new measures specifically designed to encourage the development of integrated education.

On education for mutual understanding, a new guideline was published on 20 October and is being distributed to all schools. Under the education reforms, EMU will become a compulsory cross-curricular theme.

Mr. Taylor: Will the Minister outline how he supports and funds the community relations in schools programme and the provisions that he will make for the future funding and support, not only that programme, but of other reconciliation projects?

Dr. Mawhinney: The budget for promoting cross-community contact in schools in a variety of ways, including the ones to which I have referred, and in the community, has risen sharply in the past couple of years. I hope and expect that that trend will continue.

Mr. Favell: What has been the reaction of the churches to my hon. Friend's brave initiative? Do they recognise that the way to promote understanding and harmony is to bring the children of Northern Ireland together, rather than to promulgate a form of education apartheid?

Dr. Mawhinney: It is not our wish to introduce measures that will offend against the theology or conscience of anyone in the Province, but we do not believe that such a charge could be laid against the plans for integrated education—provided that that is what the parents want for their children. So far we have been encouraged by the responses of the churches to this new and significant initiative.

Mr. Kilfedder: No matter what opposition may come from the churches, and despite any stalling, will the Minister press ahead relentlessly to purge religious apartheid from the schools in Northern Ireland? I congratulate the Minister on what he has already announced, but he should not restrict himself to those measures. He should ensure that we also expunge sectarianism from the teacher training colleges in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his kind words and for his many years of strong support for integrated education in the Province. I assure him that his commitment to giving parents choice through integrated education is no greater than mine. We are determined to see that option made available to all parents in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Beggs: Does the Minister acknowledge that, prior to this initiative, there was already a high level of integrated education in certain sectors in Northern Ireland? Will he undertake to publish the extent to which children were already being educated together irrespective of their religious background? Will he also acknowledge that the state schools in Northern Ireland are already available to be used as centres for integrated education?

Dr. Mawhinney: No, I do not accept that in the past there were strong integrated education facilities in the Province. Of course the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right in saying that, at a number of schools, pupils from both sides of the community are educated together, but he knows that such schools represent a small minority.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman that, in law, all schools in Northern Ireland are open to any pupil of any or no religious faith. I look to the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues for support in giving parents the choice and the right to choose, which demonstrably so many parents in the Province want.

Security

3. Rev. William McCrea: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the present security in Northern Ireland.

5. Mr. Molyneaux: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the security situation in Northern Ireland.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Tom King): Since I last answered questions in the House on 28 July, 38 people have been killed in incidents in Northern Ireland arising from the security situation. This includes the eight off-duty soldiers brutally murdered near Omagh. Against this background I have recently been carrying out a detailed and comprehensive review of security measures in conjunction with the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary and the General Officer Commanding the Army in Northern Ireland.

The security forces have shown great skill and courage in their defence of the community. The House will be aware of their successes in recent days in preventing a number of serious attacks and making a number of arrests. So far this year 308 people have been charged with serious offences, including 16 with murder. Almost 500 weapons, some 89,000 rounds of ammunition and more than 9,000 lb of explosives have been recovered. In addition the Garda Siochana has recovered 290 weapons, about 140,000 rounds of ammunition and more than 1,100 lb of explosives.

Rev. William McCrea: In the light of the Secretary of State's catalogue of atrocities in our Province, does he agree that it is far from peace, stability and reconciliation? Let us bear in mind the recent murder of a constituent of mine, Reserve Constable McCrone in county Fermanagh, and the massive find of bomb material. I congratulate the police officer who found it on his alertness, which has helped to save the Province from another onslaught by the IRA.

What extra measures will be taken to stop the onslaught of the IRA, now that we are facing the long dark winter nights and people are filled with fear about the future?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman knows as well as all other hon. Members from Northern Ireland the many steps that have been taken in recent months by the security forces, some of which have undoubtedly contributed to the recent successes. No one can be ignorant of the greatly enhanced activity. I told the House that we would be examining the number of measures that might be taken. The House approved one of them on Tuesday night. I have tried to help the security forces in such a way that if they bring people suspected of serious crimes to court, they will have a good chance of getting convictions. I am also concerned that the guilty should receive the proper punishment for their crimes.

Mr. Molyneaux: With regard to last night's bomb attack on women and children in the Army homes complex near Londonderry, however desirable it may be to extend the protection accorded to such targets, is that not starting at the wrong end? Should not terrorists legally be taken out of circulation, and kept out of circulation?

Mr. King: I am not sure whether the right hon. Gentleman is going further than the answer that I gave. If he is advocating selective detention, he knows that we have no plans to introduce it. But I and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister have made it clear that we rule nothing out and keep these matters under review.

Mr. Gow: Does my right hon. Friend understand that a significant factor in the continuing insecurity in Northern Ireland is uncertainty about its constitutional future? Why does he persist in denying Members of this House, including the elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland, the right to amend proposed legislation affecting Northern Ireland? Why does my right hon. Friend not follow the policy set out in the 1979 Conservative party manifesto and set up a regional council in Northern Ireland with widely devolved powers over local matters?

Finally, does my right hon. Friend understand that his continued assertion that Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom would be accepted more readily in Northern Ireland and elsewhere if we truly governed Northern Ireland like the rest of the kingdom?

Mr. King: I always respect my hon. Friend's sincerity in these matters. There is no insecurity about the position of Northern Ireland, except that caused by many people who keep talking about uncertainty. The Government's position is clear, and so is that of the House, which has voted overwhelmingly for it. There will be no change in the status of Northern Ireland as part of the United Kingdom without the agreement of a majority in Northern Ireland. I have confidence in that majority and I often wish that more people who raise this point shared my confidence in it. That view, moreover, is overwhelmingly supported by successive Irish Governments. There is no question of insecurity.

In response to my hon. Friend's second point, I hope that there will be legislation that Northern Ireland Members and hon. Members from elsewhere will have a chance to amend. Without anticipating the Queen's Speech, I suggest to my hon. Friend that he may find plenty of opportunities in the coming Session.

Mr. Stanbrook: My right hon. Friend has said that Northern Ireland is presently recognised as part of the United Kingdom. Unfortunately, the Anglo-Irish Agreement simply confirms Northern Ireland's existing constitutional status, but under Irish law the Province is part of the Irish Republic. My right hon. Friend has gained nothing from that exchange. I suggest to my right hon. Friend that if he wants to keep terrorists out of sight and out of the way during the emergency, he should institute a sentence of imprisonment for the duration of the emergency and not release any terrorists to go back on to the streets and commit terrorist crimes again.

Mr. King: I note what my hon. Friend says and will not comment further on his last point. The first part of his question makes my point absolutely. Here is a lawyer arguing and sowing in the minds of Northern Ireland people doubt and insecurity that does not exist. Everybody knows that the reality of the agreement is quite clear. There will be no change in the status of Northern Ireland without the agreement of a majority. If my hon. Friend does not know the present status of Northern Ireland, everybody else does, and its status will remain as it is unless a majority want to change it.

Mr. Winnick: Arising from the remarks of the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), could the Secretary of State give us his views on whether the security and the political situation in Northern Ireland will be helped or hindered by the application from the North Down Conservative Association to affiliate to the Conservative party, since the chairman of the Conservative party is very much against such affiliation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. Members must keep to the question on security.

Mr. Winnick rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Whenever the hon. Gentleman gets up he strays from the question on the Order Paper. Please keep to it.

Mr. McNamara: I congratulate the chairman of the Conservative party and the Secretary of State on yesterday's comments. May I raise with the Secretary of State the important matter of security at married quarters, about which the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea) spoke? There is concern that women and children should be properly protected. It is particularly nasty that within the anniversary of what happened at Enniskillen this attack should have been considered. Can the Secretary of State give confidence to the House that the necessary security measures will be taken to protect married quarters in Northern Ireland? The Opposition support what he said about the status of Northern Ireland, but, of course, we attach a particular political significance to article 1*(c)*.

Mr. King: I am glad to see that the hon. Gentleman has signed up to articles 1(a) and 1(b). I will settle for that. Those articles in the Anglo-Irish Agreement show the reality of the situation and I see no prospect of their changing. The hon. Gentleman's first point is a serious one. The House will share my disgust at last night's attack. It is further confirmation that, for the IRA, women and children are fair game. I continue to ask myself what sort of cause can be furthered, or what credit or ambition can be built up for the future, by trampling over the bodies of women and children. I hope that the House will treat, as I do, the statements by the IRA and the attack with the contempt that they deserve. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I have already had discussions about security at married quarters and careful consideration is being given to taking the necessary security measures.

Mr. Cormack: Is my right hon. Friend aware that most people think that neither his resolve nor his sincerity should be called into question, and that doing so does no good to Northern Ireland or to the causes that we should all uphold.

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend and second what he said.

Harland and Wolff

7. Mr. Jim Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his plans to privatise Harland and Wolff, in the light of the recent breakdown of negotiations with Mr. Ravi Tikkoo.

11. Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will consider reversing his decision to privatise Harland and Wolff, in the light of the breakdown of negotiations with Mr. Ravi Tikkoo and the implications for the company's ability to bid for military contracts of current uncertainty about its future status.

16. Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the privatisation of Harland and Wolff Ltd., Belfast.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Viggers): The Government believe firmly that privatisation provides the best prospects for Harland and Wolff to achieve long-term viability and it is therefore our intention to return the company to the private sector. The breakdown in negotiations with Mr. Tikkoo was a disappointment, but discussions are continuing with other interested parties. The company chairman, John Parker, is also examining the feasibility of a management-employee buy out and this, too, will receive detailed consideration.

With regard to Ministry of Defence work, I have made it clear that a privately-owned Harland and Wolff will be free to bid for future contracts. The eligibility of the company for such work would be assessed by the Ministry of Defence in the normal way.

Mr. Marshall: I hope that the Minister will accept that Mr. Tikkoo is to be congratulated on discussing with the Government for so long the possible purchase of Harland and Wolff. However, he should remember that the only thing that Mr. Tikkoo wished to do in the first place was to have a ship built at Harland and Wolff. Why have the Government made it virtually impossible for a publicly-owned Harland and Wolff to do three things: first, to react in a positive fashion to the Tikkoo bid; secondly, to tender for Ministry of Defence work; and, thirdly, to react to the ban on the proposed building of the £8 million dredger, put forward by the south coast shipping company. Surely even the Minister recognises that a publicly-owned company which obtained at least two of the three orders would be far more attractive to the private sector than Harland and Wolff is at present.

Mr. Viggers: We gave every possible support to Mr. Tikkoo in his approach to build the Ultimate Dream cruiseliner and to acquire the yard. That was the basis on which he was content to negotiate. I ask the hon. Gentleman not to sell short the Government's efforts. The Government are in close negotiation with prospective purchasers of Harland and Wolff. It is an integral part of our discussions that substantial orders will be placed with the yard forthwith. If successful, the negotiations will secure the future of the yard and its order book for many years. That is the goal towards which Ministers are working.

Mr. Lloyd: The Minister has avoided the question of Ministry of Defence contracts. Will he tell the House why Harland and Wolff was prevented by his Department from tendering for the Ministry of Defence contract for the aviation support ship? Will he put it clearly on the record whether it was his Department that prevented Harland and Wolff from taking part in that process? Will Harland and Wolff be allowed to tender for Ministry of Defence work while it is still in the public sector?

Mr. Viggers: I have made it clear that it is obviously not sensible at this critical stage to proceed with other prospective ship orders, as they could be inconsistent with the shipbuilding plans of a new owner.

I confirm that Harland and Wolff, in the private sector, will, of course, be free to tender for Ministry of Defence orders and full intervention aid support will be available.

Mr. Beggs: How many customers have been put off and how many potential orders has Harland and Wolff not been permitted to tender for because of this mailed fist, or even blackmail, policy that has been used to push through privatisation? Does the Minister recognise that, unless Harland and Wolff accepts some orders soon, thousands of men will be out of work and it will be impossible to find a new owner or work for those presently employed in Belfast?

Mr. Viggers: I recognise that hon. Members are in some difficulty because they cannot be privy to the confidential discussions of Government, but the hon. Gentleman should not sell short the efforts of the Government and of the yard. I have had preliminary discussions today with another substantial company which has expressed interest in the future of the yard.

Mr. Peter Robinson: When the Minister told The Guardian last week that he was fighting hard for Harland and Wolff, was he referring to its being closed out of the initial consultations regarding the aviation support ship? Was he referring to the refusal to give Harland and Wolff the contract for the Ultimate Dream, unless it was in the private sector, or to the scandal, which was announced yesterday, of the Minister turning down a further order of a dredger from Harland and Wolff, simply because it was not yet in the private sector? Will he please attempt to make my constituents understand how Harland and Wolff would be less attractive for privatisation if it had a full order book?

Mr. Viggers: It is well known in Northern Ireland that my right hon. Friend fought long and hard to win the AOR order for Harland and Wolff. I would ask the hon. Gentleman where he was when the discussions were taking place. My right hon. Friend has not changed in his determination to do everything possible to secure the future of the yard.

Mr. Brazier: Does my hon. Friend accept that many of us—not all on this side of the House—very much wish the best for Harland and Wolff, but nevertheless feel that it has had every bit the upper end of the playing field in the various competitions for military vessels? We wish Harland and Wolff good fortune, but at the same time we must be fair to British yards this side of the water. There is a limit to how much we can listen to complaints on this issue.

Mr. Viggers: The Government have supported Harland and Wolff to the tune of £260 million in the past five years alone. That demonstrates their determination to support the yard. We are now convinced that the future of the yard lies not in the public sector but in the private sector, and we are determined to do our best to achieve that transition.

Mr. Ashdown: The Minister has not explained to the House why he believes that Harland and Wolff would be more attractive with empty order books than with full ones. Is it not the case that Harland and Wolff was excluded from the early stages of the MOD contracts for the AOR vessels? Why does he now seek to ensure that Harland and Wolff will not win that £8 million order and the yard will be sacrificed on the Government's mad ideology on privatisation?

Mr. Viggers: The hon. Gentleman is confusing the AOR with the ASS and the ASS with the dredger order. I have answered the question. A prospective acquirer of the yard may well bring to the yard orders which would be inconsistent with other MOD or external orders.

GOC (Meetings)

8. Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met the Army GOC in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement about their discussions.

Mr. Tom King: I last met the GOC on Monday 7 November, together with the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary, to discuss certain aspects of the security situation. The substance must, of course, be confidential.

Mr. Mallon: Will the Secretary of State confirm that, in the border brigade area, primacy of operational decision has passed, or been taken, from the police and given to the Army? Does he agree that that is a sinister and fundamental change of policy that has been forced upon him as Secretary of State and on the Chief Constable of the RUC by the faceless military people who are now the de facto rulers in Northern Ireland?

Mr. King: If they are, they have not told me. The hon. Gentleman's ingenious question deviates considerably from the real situation. There is no change in the position on police primacy. The Chief Constable has responsibility for operational matters and the Army works in support of the civil power, but in certain respects in the border brigade, and in operations against terrorism, the Chief Constable has delegated certain operational responsibilities and authority to the Army. The Army acts under his authority. That is the position. It is quite clear, it has my full support, and I, the Chief Constable and the GOC keep it under close review.

Mr. Marlow: Is it not the case that since three terrorists met a well-merited death at the hands of the security forces the level of violence and terrorist activity has reduced in the Province? Is this a coincidence, or does my right hon. Friend make some deductions from it?

Mr. King: In terms of attempted terrorist incidents, that is not actually correct. However, I draw the attention of the House to the great energy and determination of the security forces. While there is a constant threat of attack, undoubtedly there have been a number of recent successes. A number of arrests have been made and the security forces certainly deserve every congratulation for that.

Mr. Maginnis: When the Secretary of State talks to the GOC, does he recollect that each time he comes to the House to report on the security situation in Northern Ireland he produces a long and sad catalogue of deaths? He also produces a never-ending catalogue of arms and explosives found. Will he remind the GOC that if we could have continuity of frontier operations we would have a much greater chance of reducing the easy flow of arms and explosives from the Irish Republic into Northern Ireland? Since 92 per cent. of IRA murders are unresolved through the courts, does the right hon. Gentleman discuss with the GOC the need to dismantle the command and control structures of the IRA? Will he ask officers further down the line what they feel as they have to go out, week after week, sacrificing life and limb to try to uphold the status quo with the limited resources made available to them by the Secretary of State?

Mr. King: The answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Mid-Ulster (Rev. William McCrea) sought to explain certain ways in which I am seeking to ensure that the security forces receive the support they deserve in the important and dangerous work they do. I am seeking ways in which some of the objectives defined by the hon. Gentleman can be achieved. I am anxious to improve cross-border co-operation and make more effective the work of the Garda Siochana and the Irish Army working in support of it. Those are some measures that can help. I take seriously the hon. Gentleman's point about the need to ensure that the security forces receive all the backing we can provide in the circumstances in which they operate.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Will the right hon. Gentleman take it from me that the statement issued a few days ago concerning the Loughgall incident was widely welcomed by all right-thinking people in Northern Ireland, who are glad that those responsible for dealing with the IRA effectively will not be brought before the courts? Will he take it from me also that there is also a desire among all right-thinking people that any innocent person who happens to be in the wrong place at the wrong time should receive compensation as promptly as possible?

Mr. King: Obviously, deaths of or injuries to any innocent people are deeply regretted. I do not think that there is any serious argument about the purpose of the terrorists killed in that attack. It was a miracle that there were no serious casualties among the security forces. We are often attacked by people who say that the procedures do not properly scrutinise the rule of law and the pursuit of the rule of law. It is worth remembering, as the hon. Gentleman knows, that what I reported on that occasion was the outcome of the scrutiny procedure. Every time a death is suffered by the security forces it is subject to close scrutiny and is the subject of a report to the Director of Public Prosecutions. That shows how we seek at all times to ensure that the rule of law is upheld.

Orders in Council

9. Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the relationship between the drafts of the Police and Criminal Evidence Order 1988 and the Criminal Evidence Order 1988.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Mr. Ian Stewart): The draft Police and Criminal Evidence Order substantially overhauls and rationalises the general criminal law in Northern Ireland and reflects provisions enacted for England and Wales in the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. The separate Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order, which was debated and approved by the House on Tuesday, allows courts to draw an inference from the silence of the accused in certain circumstances.

Mr. Madden: Does the Minister not believe that the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order seriously weakens the limited rights of the individual given in the proposed Police and Criminal Evidence Order? Does he not believe that the ability to detain suspects for 48 hours without the right to legal advice, the requirement not to supply official statements to suspects before they enter police stations and the absence of any requirement to tape record interviews with suspects will undermine the credibility of the police and the judiciary in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Stewart: I do not believe that that is the case. The hon. Gentleman has referred to a number of aspects of the draft Police and Criminal Evidence Order, which, as he will know, has been out for consultation. We are currently considering the results of the responses that we have received. I do not believe that the Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order is a diminution of rights. It makes it more likely that justice will be seen to be done. I do not think that the innocent have anything to fear from it. It will lead to a better system of justice in the Province, which is what we should all want.

Health and Social Services

10. Mr. Andrew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he intends to increase funding on health and social services in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The hon. Member wil be aware that new public expenditure plans announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Autumn Statement included revised figures for the total of Northern Ireland public expenditure. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is considering how the totals announced should be allocated to functional programmes and he will make an announcement shortly.

Mr. Smith: I thank the Minister for his reply and take this opportunity to congratulate those working voluntarily and professionally in health and social services in Northern Ireland. On the recent Select Committee visit to Northern Ireland we saw the work that they are doing. They are dedicated to their jobs, which they often do under very difficult circumstances. Does the Minister welcome the degree of multi-party agreement shown by the call from representatives of the Ulster Unionists, SDLP and the alliance for the maintenance of per capita expenditure on health in Northern Ireland? How will the democratically elected representatives of the people of Northern Ireland be involved in the allocation of the money that the Secretary of State will be announcing? Will the Government grasp this opportunity of building bridges between the communities in Northern Ireland by responding positively to that call?

Mr. Needham: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his comments about the visit he paid to Northern Ireland, which we welcomed. We have a successful Health Service in Northern Ireland, on which we spend approximately 24 per cent. more per head than in the remainder of the United Kingdom. In the Autumn Statement my right hon. Friend the Chancellor mentioned a 4·5 per cent. increase in real growth, which will apply also in Northern Ireland. It would be easy to involve politicians in any process in Northern Ireland if they were prepared to become involved and to begin discussing the way forward with the Government.

Mr. Bellingham: I welcome what the Minister said about per capita expenditure in Northern Ireland being 24 per cent. more than on the mainland, but does that not illustrate that even if we spent another £5 billion or £6 billion on the Health Service here some would still say that it was not enough?

Mr. Needham: I am sure that my hon. Friend is right. The difference in expenditure between Northern Ireland and the rest of the country arises entirely from the difference in need.

Anglo-Irish Agreement

12. Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the scheduled review of the Anglo-Irish Agreement.

Mr. Tom King: The review of the working of the Intergovernmental Conference, prescribed by article 11 of the agreement, will begin three years after the agreement was signed on 15 November. I remain anxious to have all views that hon. Members and others may wish to put forward.

Mrs. Clwyd: When will the Government take a more constructive approach to the agreement by pursuing the wide range of reforms that are necessary? When will they implement article 10 of the agreement, which commits the Irish and British Governments to co-operating to promote the economic and social development of both parts of Ireland?

Mr. King: The table of progress, which I hope we shall publish shortly, will bring home how much progress has been made in the search for confidence in the administration of justice and some of the economic and social sectors. We have laid the foundations for co-operation, which could be valuable to people on both sides of the border.

Mr. Dykes: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, despite enormous difficulties and some reckless sabotage attempts from certain quarters, the agreement has been a great success? Will he reaffirm the Government's determination not only to continue this important agreement but to strengthen it?

Mr. King: The agreement has considerable potential benefits for people throughout the island of Ireland, both in the Republic of Ireland and Northern Ireland. This is not a matter—we are dealing with ancient hostilities and mistrusts that exist in the island of Ireland—in which immediate success can be achieved. The agreement provides an opportunity for close co-operation and, if handled sensibly, it could be of great benefit.

Mr. McNamara: Is the Secretary of State aware that we welcome his invitation to put forward our ideas on the Anglo-Irish Agreement and hope that all parties in the House and in Northern Ireland will take advantage of that? Would there not be an advantage in forthcoming years in having a regular calendar of meetings, with open agendas, at which parties throughout the country could make representations, with a full report-back afterwards, thus avoiding accusations of secrecy?

Mr. King: I am glad to hear that the hon. Gentleman will be putting forward views, no doubt on behalf of his right hon. and hon. Friends, and I have no doubt also that those very genuine and sensible points will be included.

Less-favoured Areas

13. Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why the recommendations in respect of the redesignation of the less-favoured areas in Northern Ireland has not been presented to the European Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Viggers: All the very detailed information needed to support a request to the Commission of the European Community for an extension of the less-favoured areas in all the United Kingdom regions has now been assembled. This means that we are in sight of being able to put a request to the Commission, but the request will be subject to detailed examination by the Commission. This might take some time and we cannot be certain of a favourable decision.

Mr. McGrady: Is the Minister aware that the inordinate delay in processing the extension of the less-favoured areas affects 4,600 farmers in Northern Ireland who cannot avail themselves of grant under the agricultural development programme? Will the hon. Gentleman do his utmost to expedite the claim in Brussels for an extension?

Mr. Viggers: The matter is being considered in the context of the United Kingdom as a whole. As the hon. Gentleman points out, 4,600 requests have been made from Northern Ireland alone. The number has also been very substantial throughout the United Kingdom. The hon. Gentleman has been assiduous in pursuing the matter, and I asssure him that the Government are equally assiduous in pursuing it.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 November.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meeetings later today.

Mr. Maclennan: In considering the responses to the Government's proposals on student loans, will the Prime Minister acknowledge that the purpose of Government support for students should be to increase substantially the number of people in higher education in this country? As the proposals announced are based on a projection that there will be no increase in student numbers by 1996, will that not lay this country open to dangerous competition from other, better-educated industrialised democracies?

The Prime Minister: The system of student grants and now of top-up loans is one of the most generous in the whole world, I am sure that most people appreciate that. Increasing numbers, and an increasing proportion of students, are going into higher education. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will welcome that. One of the purposes of yesterday's announcement is to help people who at present cannot go to university to take top-up loans so that they can take up places which might not otherwise be available to them.

Q2. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Thurnham: In congratulating President-elect George Bush on his victory, will my right hon. Friend thank him for the part that America has played in helping to ensure a record 43 years of peace in Europe? Will she offer him her continued staunch support for the future strength of the Alliance?

The Prime Minister: I gladly join my hon. Friend and most hon. Members in congratulating Vice-President George Bush on his splendid victory, which was a personal triumph for him. I also take the opportunity to thank the United States for being such a staunch ally in NATO and stationing some 330,000 troops in Europe. I hope that that contribution will continue, but I am the first to agree that Europe must be prepared to take a full part of the burden of the defence of Europe and to point out that this country does just that, as can be seen from the recent Autumn Statement.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister tell us why members of the Cabinet are afraid to debate the conduct and plans of the Chancellor of the Exchequer? What do they have to hide?

The Prime Minister: There is no question of being afraid to debate it. Indeed, I have noticed that on the 17 days this year when the Opposition could have chosen to debate economics they chose to do so on only two, so they cannot relish facing my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer very much.

Mr. Kinnock: It must be obvious, even to the Prime Minister, that the Chancellor has woven a tangled web around himself. Why will she not give him an opportunity to clear his name in the House?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has built the best economy that this country has ever known, and everyone in the House has done very well out of it.

Mr. Kinnock: Perhaps the Prime Minister will now tell us whether she agrees with the Chancellor that only "a tiny minority" of pensioners have problems in making ends meet.

The Prime Minister: The simple fact is that only 18 per cent. of pensioners are on income support. That is quite clearly a minority.

Sir George Young: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that one thing at least is now clear following the Chancellor's briefing of the press last Friday—that the Government are considering additional ways to help the less well-off pensioner?

The Prime Minister: Yes, that is absolutely correct.

Q3. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Prime Minster if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Marshall: Will the Prime Minister please explain to the House why, in most parts of Scotland, she is regarded as public enemy No. 1?

The Prime Minister: If I might say so, Scotland has done very well by the policies that I have had the privilege to implement.

Mr. Ralph Howell: As every Labour Government have operated a means test for all our citizens, is not the Leader of the Opposition talking total humbug——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must ask questions of the Prime Minister, not the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Howell: Will my right hon. Friend give urgent consideration to producing one form from which a decision can be made on whether tax should be paid or benefits given to top-up inadequate income?

The Prime Minister: I would not be in favour of such a system, as it would lead to endless complexity. However, my hon. Friend is right to remind the House that the National Assistance Act started in 1948, having been introduced by a Labour Government, who followed it throughout all their time in Government. It is for means-tested benefits in addition to the fundamental basic state pension.

Q4. Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cohen: What advice has the Prime Minister for President-elect Bush about tackling the US debt problem? Could it not spark off a serious international economic crisis? Would not one way to help be to spend less, not more, on armaments? Will the Prime Minister advise following that policy and not beat around the bush?

The Prime Minister: In considering the budget deficit as a proportion of gross domestic product, I can only say that the American deficit is very much smaller than that which Labour had in this country during its time in office.

Q5. Mr. Patnick: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Patnick: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the way to keep hooligans out of football grounds is through a national membership scheme? Will she call upon all football clubs to introduce and implement such a scheme as soon as possible?

The Prime Minister: Yes. As my hon. Friend is aware, the Minister with responsibility for sport introduced a report yesterday. It is right to have national identity cards for those who attend football matches——

Mr. Home Robertson: In England.

The Prime Minister: Yes, in England. We do not expect it to apply to Scotland.

We are anxious, as are most people, that families return to watching football as a recreation and a family outing. We believe that that is the way to separate hooliganism from football.

Mr. Corbett: Has the Prime Minister seen today's reported remarks of the Secretary of State for Health, accusing nurses at Birmingham children's hospital of not doing the work for which they are paid? Will she share my offence at such remarks and ask the Secretary of State to withdraw them, on the grounds that those nurses are dedicated and professional, are doing their job in difficult circumstances, and are doing exactly what they are paid for? Does she agree that the argument is about their grading?

The Prime Minister: I have not seen any such remarks by my right hon. and learned Friend. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, the structure of the grading was agreed between management and nurses, and the regions have applied it to about 440,000 nurses. For that purpose, an extra amount has been given by the taxpayer, such that the total extra amount is about £928 million. If any nurse is aggrieved by her grading, she can go to appeal under procedures agreed by management and unions.

Q6. Mr. Hanley: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hanley: My right hon. Friend will have noticed that it was announced yesterday that last year British companies, both large and small, gave over £1 billion to charity. Does that endorse her vision of a giving society and show that, if they are allowed greater control over a larger proportion of their money, people give wisely and generously?

The Prime Minister: Yes. Both companies and individuals are giving very generously, and much more generously than they were able to give several years ago. One should like to thank companies not only for giving to charities but for the excellent work they are doing in inner cities and for the way in which many of them are taking a much greater interest in local schools, thus giving children a far greater interest in the future and a far greater prospect of obtaining the right jobs.

Q8. Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Prime Minister is she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hoyle: Why is the Prime Minister in favour of sanctions on trade with Poland but not in favour of sanctions on trade with South Africa? Is her advice to the black people of South Africa that they should live in Poland?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, there are certain sanctions on South Africa, which are operated through the United Nations and which we honour, and there are other certain small sanctions which we have agreed through the Commonwealth, which we also honour. My purpose is to ensure that we do everything that we can to help Poland come to an agreement with the International Monetary Fund as to how best to conduct her industrial and financial affairs in future. We in this country will be the first to help to reschedule Poland's debts and to give extra help—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman might not like the long answer, but he does not like listening to sense.

Mr. Wells: I am aware that the whole House will want to congratulate my right hon. Friend on digging her way through the rocks and quicksands that confronted her on her recent visit to Poland. Has her visit made it more possible for Polish people to choose a freer and better way of life?

The Prime Minister: I made it quite clear that I was grateful to General Jaruzelski for ensuring that I was able to go wheresoever I chose in Poland to see whomsoever I chose to see, to have discussions and talks, not only with Solidarity, but with many independent people, who were able to put their views to me. I was extremely grateful for that. One problem with Solidarity is that there is no other expression of opposition on an organised basis in Poland. Things will be much better when there is a visible focus for people to make their own views known, which will be of great value to the Government. The round table is perhaps the first attempt to try to secure such a forum.

Q9. Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 10 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Fatchett: As the Prime Minister of Westland, does the Prime Minister feel that she is the best person to judge the integrity of the Chancellor?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Gentleman is aware, Westland's future was determined by its commercial future. That was absolutely the right decision. We have one of the best Chancellors that this country has ever had.

Sir Anthony Meyer: As my right hon. Friend was unable to be in Paris yesterday to pay tribute to the memory of Monsieur Jean Monnet, will she take this opportunity to pay her tribute to the man of vision for his contributions to both the unity of Europe and the allied victory in the last war?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I gladly pay tribute to Jean Monnet. I understand that there was a very moving ceremony yesterday in Paris. We were not able to go from here because, as my hon. Friend is aware, we had a state visit in this country.

Business of the House

3.30 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): Will the Leader of the House tell us the business of the House for tomorrow and next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): It may be for the convenience of the House if I announce the rearranged business for tomorrow at the same time as the business for next week:

FRIDAY 11 NOVEMBER—Timetable motion on the School Boards (Scotland) Bill and the Housing Bill, followed by consideration of Lords amendments to the School Boards (Scotland) Bill and conclusion of consideration of Lords amendments to the Housing Bill.

MONDAY 14 NOVEMBER—Remaining stages of the Road Traffic Bill [Lords], the Road Traffic (Consequential Provisions) Bill [Lords] and the Road Traffic Offenders Bill [Lords], which are consolidation measures.

Afterwards there will be debates on motions to take note of EC documents on:

—safety in the workplace and personal protective equipment;

—on risks to workers from biological agents, the control of genetically modified organisms and the regulation of biotechnology;

—on tar yields of cigarettes and the labelling of tobacco products;

—on waste from the titanium dioxide industry; and —on dimensions of articulated vehicles.

Details of the EC documents concerned will be given in the Official Report.

TUESDAY 15 NOVEMBER—Subject to progress of business it will be proposed that the House will meet for prorogation at 9.30 am.

Mr. Speaker, the House may be asked to consider any Lords messages and other business as necessary.

The new Session will be opened on Tuesday 15 November.

[Monday 14 November 1988 (5 separate debates):

Mr. Dobson: It would probably be kinder not to comment on the business shambles proposed for tomorrow—[Interruption.]—but as the Chancellor of the Exchequer is apparently prepared to defend himself on television and radio and to give partial information to newspapers about what he did or did not say last Friday, why have the Cabinet refused to provide time to debate the motion criticising the Chancellor which has been tabled in the names of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and others? Is it that the Chancellor is afraid to come and face the music, or are the rest of the Cabinet afraid what he might let slip when trying to defend what he said he did not say? It is not unusual for the Opposition to call for a vote of no confidence in a Chancellor, but it is a rare event for a Cabinet to pass one, yet that is what we have seen today.

Will the Leader of the House therefore reconsider his decision, or try to get his Cabinet colleagues to reconsider their decision, so that we can debate this important motion, because this matter will not go away? Whatever happens before the Queen's Speech, this issue will not be allowed to rest by us. We believe that the Leader of the House owes it to the Chancellor, to the pensioners who are perturbed about the threat of means testing and to the journalists involved, whose integrity has been thrown into question by the Chancellor, to have that debate, and to have it soon.

Mr. Wakeham: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has answered a private notice question in the House and spoken about events outside the House, but I have considered the early-day motion in the name of the Leader of the Opposition. As Leader of the House I must have regard for the views of the whole House. The business that I have announced for Monday is important, and many hon. Members have an interest in it. If the Opposition wish to pursue the question of a debate on their early-day motion, there will be opportunities in the new Session for them to do so.

I do not accept for a moment what the hon. Gentleman said about the guillotine motion or the Government's legislative programme. As Leader of the House I have to take into account the views of all hon. Members, and it was clear last night that the arrangements between the Government and the official Opposition for dealing with the Housing Bill were not acceptable to the House as a whole. In those circumstances, I was doubtful whether the proposal to take the School Boards (Scotland) Bill would be generally acceptable. That is why I have arranged for the House to have an opportunity tomorrow to debate and reach a final decision on the future handling of both those Bills.

What the hon. Gentleman said about the Government's legislative programme is complete nonsense. Thirty-four pieces of Government legislation have already received Royal Assent this Session and another two have completed all their stages. The fact is that this Government have succeeded far better than the Labour Government ever did in bringing to completion an extensive and popular legislative programme, and Opposition Members do not like it.

Mr. Michael Jopling (Westmorland and Lonsdale): When my right hon. Friend moves the timetable motion tomorrow and listens to the synthetic indignation from the Opposition, will he take care to remind the House that he has never yet come within sight of breaking the record of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), who as Leader of the House moved five guillotine motions in one day?

Mr. Wakeham: My right hon. Friend is right. There have been many worse occasions than what will happen tomorrow. I regret that we have to debate a guillotine motion on a Friday, but we have the record of the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) as a precedent, which we hope never to repeat.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): Is the Leader of the House aware that many people consider that the Chancellor of the Exchequer misled the House by his statement last week? The only way to clear up that matter is by a debate in this House. Why have the Government shirked such a debate on Monday?

Mr. Wakeham: I have already dealt with that in answer to the right hon. Gentleman's hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). I am acting entirely in accordance with precedent.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Will my right hon. Friend confirm the remarks of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, reported in The Independent today, that the only test of a Conservative is whether he supports the Anglo-Irish Agreement? If, as a result of our right hon. Friend's suggestion to the national union, the North Down Conservative Association is not allowed to join the national union, will my right hon. Friend confirm—for the Government are well known for their consistency—that he will recommend that all Conservative associations which do not support the Anglo-Irish Agreement are expelled and, what is more, that all Conservative Members of Parliament who do not support the Anglo-Irish Agreement have the Whip withdrawn?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend tempts me, but I shall restrict my remarks to Government business. The overwhelming bulk of hon. Members on both sides of the House believe that the Anglo-Irish Agreement is a worthwhile initiative and should produce substantial benefits to the people of Ireland, both in the North and in the Republic. I have long since learnt not to talk about Whipping matters, and I do not believe that it is appropriate for me to make any comment about the Conservative party from the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): As the matter of previous guillotines has been raised, may I make a proposition to the Leader of the House which may help him out of some of his difficulties, although, particularly with a majority of well over 100, I have never seen such a legislative shambles as that which he presides over? May I make him a fair bargain to settle the matter once and for all? If I agree to a debate on the merits of my five guillotine motions in the next two or three days, will the right hon. Gentleman agree to find time to debate our motion on the Chancellor of the Exchequer? Let us have debates on both matters. Or is the right hon. Gentleman really going to run away from the challenge of a debate about the performance of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the House a few days ago?

Mr. Wakeham: Perhaps I was a little unfair to the hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent, and that caused him to rise to his feet. I should have explained to the House that the reason why he was forced to table five guillotine motions on one day was that there was no other way in which he could have got his business through the House by the necessary date.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): As Hansard revealed on Tuesday, the EEC management committee, on which the Government are represented, is now selling substantial quantities of butter at 2½p per pound, compared with £1 a pound in this country. Will my right hon. Friend try to allow some time for us to discuss the implications for the British taxpayer and consumer of those developments? Will my right hon.Friend bear in mind that the EEC is spending more money every three days on the dumping and destruction of food than the yearly amount that will be received from the charges for sight tests and dental tests?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise my hon. Friend's concern about these matters. Debates on the European Community and its various activities are important, and I have announced a number of such debates for next week. I shall bear in mind what my hon. Friend has said, in the hope that there will be a more general debate in the not too distant future.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Has the Leader of the House had a chance to consider reports in the press in the past two days that the emission of radio nuclides into the atmosphere over the weekend 28-29 October in the Greater Liverpool and Greater Manchester areas was the equivalent of three to nine times higher than the normal levels of background radiation? Does he agree that that justifies a Minister coming to the House to explain what led to those levels and why the local authorities were not notified of what had happened?

Mr. Wakeham I have to tell the hon. Gentleman that the Department has not been notified of any release of radioactive material within the United Kingdom or of any overseas nuclear incident. I shall refer the hon. Gentleman's request to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): Next Tuesday is the anniversary of the signing of the Anglo-Irish Agreement, which the majority of people in Northern Ireland regard as a great betrayal because their elected representatives were not consulted, although the elected representatives of the minority were consulted. May we have a debate next Tuesday so that the Government can put forward evidence to show that the agreement has achieved its aims of peace and reconciliation? As the Member of Parliament for North Down, a constituency that has been mentioned in the House, may I say that I do not mind what candidates come forward against me in the next election?

Mr. Wakeham: I am glad to hear that my hon. Friend is as confident as ever.

I cannot arrange a debate next week on Northern Ireland, although I recognise that there is a demand for a debate in the House on that subject. The appropriate time to have such a debate is a matter for discussion. I shall bear my hon. Friend's suggestion in mind.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): The Leader of the House will recall that there has been growing disquiet about private business. He will also recall that the Joint Committee on Private Bill Procedure, which was set up by this House and the House of Lords, has produced an excellent report. Will the Leader of the House give us some idea of how soon that report will be discussed in the House and an opportunity provided for us to vote on it? On Tuesday there were once again illustrations of the unsatisfactory problems of private business, and there may be problems again tonight.

[Mr. Andrew F. Bennett]

Mr. Wakeham: I know that the hon. Gentleman takes a great interest in these matters and has great knowledge of them. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson) and to the other members of the Committee, who have produced a valuable report. Private business is a complex subject, in which there are many aspects to be addressed. I appreciate the considerable interest of hon. Members and I hope that, unusually, it will be possible to arrange a debate before the Government have responded to the Committee's recommendations in the normal way, so that we can hear the views of the House.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): The European Community documents that we shall be discussing on Monday cover several different subjects. Is it proposed that we should have an umbrella debate on all of them, or a separate debate on each? If the latter, will the debates be timed to ensure that each subject is adequately discussed?

Mr. Wakeham: As a result of representations that we have received, we have decided to proceed in the normal fashion. The debates will follow one after the other and the normal Standing Orders of the House will apply.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Is the Leader of the House aware that many people were interested in the reports of eminent journalists last weekend and that, as a consequence, they now want a straight answer to a simple question? Will old-age pensioners be guaranteed free prescriptions while the Government are in office? Can the Leader of the House give us that guarantee, or a debate on the subject?

Mr. Wakeham: I am afraid that I was not present at that party. I have nothing to add to anything that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor or my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister have said on the subject.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Will my right hon. Friend note that important Scottish legislation, which the Scottish people are anxious should reach the statute book—the School Boards (Scotland) Bill—has once again been threatened and compromised by the activities of Left-wing London Members? Will he view with extreme scepticism any request by the Opposition for the establishment of a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs, in which they have no interest, given that the Scottish Office has given evidence to Select Committees of the House on 23 occasions?

Mr. Wakeham: I know that my hon. and learned Friend takes a great deal of interest in the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs. I have indicated that we shall arrange a debate to discuss the matter, and I have nothing further to add until that debate.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Has the Leader of the House looked at the outstanding Lords amendments to the deeply resented School Boards (Scotland) Bill? Will he confirm that this is the first time in history that a Government have moved a guillotine motion on a handful of minor and technical amendments? Is it a sign of panic?

Mr. Wakeham: No. I know that the Opposition suggested that they would like the amendments to be taken formally, and I shall certainly take that into account when drawing up the timetable motion. I hope that it will be possible to arrange matters so that if the House does not wish to spend the time provided on the School Boards (Scotland) Bill, additional time can be spent on the Housing Bill, if that is what the House wishes.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Can my right hon. Friend confirm that this week's business, as originally announced, was agreed through the usual channels? Does he know what went wrong with the Opposition last night?

Mr. Wakeham: If anything went wrong last night, I do not suppose that the Opposition would tell me about it. I do not think that discussions through the usual channels are best ventilated on the Floor of the House. We do our best.

Mr. Charles Kennedy (Ross, Cromarty and Skye): The Leader of the House has said umpteen times during business questions that he hopes to have a debate on the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs by the end of the Session. We have reached the end of the Session, and we are not to have a debate. The continuing lack of discussion of the absence of a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs is nothing short of an insult to Scottish politics. When in the next Session does the right hon. Gentleman propose to have a debate?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not think that I said quite what the hon. Gentleman suggests. I said that I had put certain proposals to the Opposition which were unfortunately unacceptable to them. If those proposals had been accepted, the Select Committee could have been set up a long time ago. I regret that that did not happen. I have said that we shall organise a debate, and the timing of that debate is best discussed through the usual channels. I had hoped to arrange it before now, but there has been substantial pressure on business, and I regret that it will now not be possible to have a debate before the end of this Session.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): My right hon. Friend will recall that throughout this Session one matter has dominated press reports—the Cleveland child sex abuse issue which has not been debated in the Chamber. It is remiss of both the Government and the Opposition to fail to find time to debate the matter. Will my right hon. Friend give the need for such a debate urgent consideration in the new Session?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend has been very forthright in expressing his views and calling for a debate. I am sorry that I have not been able to arrange one, and I hope that we will be able to make some progress in the new Session.

Ms. Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): Will the Leader of the House arrange for an emergency debate on Monday on the Hinkley Point C inquiry? The inquiry is proceeding with a great deal of haste, which is denying objectors their rights to submit proofs of evidence. The inspector has announced that the closure date for submitting proofs of evidence will be in the next week or so, yet objectors are expected to comment both on economic evaluations for nuclear power and fossil fuels and on the Government's proposed legislation for the privatisation of the electricity industry. There is great worry in the country, especially in the west country, about nuclear power. It seems appropriate that the Minister should make a statement that the inquiry will stand adjourned until after the Government have announced their proposals for the privatisation of electricity.

Mr. Wakeham: I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Lady. I realise that it is an important matter and that constituency interests are involved, but I cannot arrange such a debate. Instead of seeking to get a statement in the House when a public inquiry does not entirely meet her requirements, I suggest that in the week's recess the hon. Lady reads the report of the Joint Committee on Private Bill Procedure and recognise that some of her arguments must be considered in the light of the way in which we proceed in the House.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): If we are to have a debate on a matter of historical interest, as the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot) suggested, would we not be better off having a debate on the winter of discontent, whose 10th anniversary is fast approaching, so that people can be reminded of just how unpleasant life was under a Labour Government?

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot believe that my hon. Friend is serious. This Parliament and this Government are about things for the future, not about harking back to unpleasant days.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): May I, through the right hon. Gentleman, extend my thanks to his secretary, who was kind enough to drop me at my flat in a somewhat exhausted condition at about 3.30 this morning? I might add that I was exhausted, not she. Is it not a pity that, because of the exhaustion—even more extreme than mine—and the emaciation of the Secretary of State for the Environment, we had to abandon last night's important business? Will the right hon. Gentleman give careful consideration to something that will happen on 21 November? Has he come clean with the House yet that there will be an exhibition—yet again—of the intrusion of cameras, sound equipment and lighting into the Chamber some time during 21 November? How many hon. Members have been told about this—[HON. MEMBERS: "None."]—so that we can watch the nonsense and pass our comments on it?

Mr. Wakeham: I have on a number of occasions expressed my concern about the hon. Gentleman's health and the fading of it, which I seem to notice from time to time.

I am delighted to hear that the story about last night's events ended happily and that my secretary did in fact leave the hon. Gentleman at his flat.

The Select Committee on the Televising of Proceedings of the House is making progress, and I do not believe that it is right for me to announce in the House exactly what it does from time to time.

Mr. Faulds: Hon. Members should know.

Mr. Wakeham: All the members of the Select Committee know perfectly well what meetings are being arranged.

Mr. Faulds: They are kept a secret.

Mr. Wakeham: I do not wish to keep secrets from the hon. Gentleman. We are taking the opportunity of the television cameras and the lighting coming into the House for the state opening to consider again the lighting of the House, which the hon. Gentleman was rather critical of last time. Therefore, I thought that he would congratulate us on trying to meet the requirements of all sections of the House.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is entirely consistent with convention, practice and precedent for censure motions of the kind contemplated by the Opposition to be debated in Opposition time? Furthermore, if the Opposition reflect upon it, they will appreciate that that was a rule to which they strictly adhered when in government.

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend studies these things closely and he is correct because, broadly speaking, that is the rule.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I wonder whether the Leader of the House could inform one of the Ministers at the Department of the Environment about the massive escape of methane gas at Arkwright Town in my constituency during the course of last evening and early this morning. Forty families had to be evacuated because the methane readings were more than 100 per cent.

Will the Leader of the House take account of the fact that British Coal was warned about this several months ago when it closed Arkwright pit? The contracting firm that did the job obviously failed to carry out the sealing in a proper manner. Will the right hon. Gentleman make sure that a statement is made, that a public inquiry looks into this matter at all levels, that proper reimbursement is made to the local authority that had to evacuate those 40 families and that proper compensation is paid by British Coal and the contracting firm to those families who have suffered?

Mr. Wakeham: Any incident such as the one that the hon. Gentleman has described is significant and important. I am sorry to hear of the distress caused, but I cannot accept anything else that he said. I shall refer the matter to my right hon. Friend and we shall decide how best to proceed. I shall be in touch with the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): May we have an early debate on housing investment programme allocations, so that I can inform the House of the extreme anger of my constituents at Ealing council's apparent intention to abuse those allocations by putting the ownership of public housing under the control of itself, Brent, Hounslow and Fulham and Hammersmith Labour councils in turn for three years less a day, as a way of getting around the HIP allocations? My constituents are extremely angry about that. It is bad enough having Ealing council attempting to run public housing, let alone Brent and the rest.

Mr. Wakeham: I am sorry, but I cannot see how I can fit in that debate, however interesting it might be, in the time before the House prorogues. I am sure that my hon. Friend will find an opportunity in the new Session to make the speech that he wants to make.

Mr. Eddie Loyden (Liverpool, Garston): In view of the increased and alarming number of incidents around the coast of Britain in the past two years and the apparent indifference of the Government to bringing in regulations that will deal with what has become an increasing activity around our coast, when will the Leader of the House arrange for a debate so that the necessary legislation to tighten up the regulations can be brought in by the Government?

Mr. Wakeham: I am sorry not to be helpful to the hon. Gentleman, as I realise that it is a serious question, but he said, "incidents around the coast of Britain", but he did not say what sort of incident. If he would like to have a word with me afterwards, I shall certainly do my best to answer his question.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall call those hon. Members who have been standing, but I draw the attention of the House to the fact that we have an important statement after this and an equally important debate before opposed private business at Seven o'clock.

Mr. Nicholas Baker (Dorset, North): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the urgent need for more low-cost housing in rural areas? Will he provide an opportunity for the debate that we were to have tomorrow morning at some future date, so that we can discuss this important issue?

Mr. Wakeham: I am sorry that we have lost tomorrow's debate. As my hon. Friend knows, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has taken an initiative on rural housing and I hope that that will help in some way to deal with what I agree is an important and difficult problem.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): When will there be an opportunity to debate the desirability or otherwise of the most senior Ministers telling the old-fashioned truth to the House of Commons?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not accept the premise of the question, so I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a satisfactory answer.

Ms. Joan Walley (Stoke-on-Trent, North): The Leader of the House will no doubt be aware that a computer error last year resulted in pensioners being paid an extra £8. Today, I ask him to tell the House whether he proposes to bring in a review order that will enable local government pensioners to be paid the extra sum that they are now owed. Their employers want to pay it to them, but cannot do so until the Government bring forward the necessary order.

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot answer the hon. Lady's question straight off, but I shall see that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State knows about it. If it is appropriate for him to answer it, we shall get in touch with the hon. Lady.

Mr. Jeff Rooker (Birmingham, Perry Barr): The public and the House know that there are at least three spare days next week. Does the Leader of the House realise that the refusal to allow the Chancellor of the Exchequer to tell us whether he understands the difference between a pledged benefit, an unpledged benefit and a new benefit will result in his silence making him the Dan Quayle of the Cabinet?

Mr. Wakeham: I should not have thought that silence was the problem of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I have nothing further to add to what has already been said.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is it not true that the Cabinet had decided there would be a debate on Monday on the early-day motion tabled by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, but that Ministers at today's meeting were notified that the Chancellor had failed a lie detector test?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman is always more eloquent when talking fiction than when talking facts. I do not believe he has ever been at a Cabinet meeting, and I am fairly certain that he never will be. No doubt his works of fiction will continue to entertain the House.

Mr. Bernie Grant (Tottenham): What action has the right hon. Gentleman taken in the case raised during last week's business questions by my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris), who is the shadow Minister for the Disabled? I refer to the case of Marquita O'Garro, a five-year-old hole-in-the-heart victim from Montserrat who could not come to Britain for an operation. Has the right hon. Gentleman spoken to his right hon. Friend, and what progress has been made?

Mr. Wakeham: I understand that there has been some progress. I shall need to check, but I think that arrangements have been made for her to go to hospital in Southampton to have the necessary treatment.

Ms. Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): Will the Leader of the House find time in the near future for a debate on the future of 16 to 18-year-olds? We were assured by the Ministers then responsible, when the social security regulations were introduced, that by this week all young people would be on YTS, in education or in a job. The bridging allowance finished this week; 636 youngsters in Cleveland have no financial assistance; and there are 32,000 in a similar situation throughout the country. That is obscene and should be discussed in the House soon.

Mr. Wakeham: As the hon. Lady knows, there are more vacancies than people to fill them countrywide. I understand that there are difficulties in one or two areas and that my right hon. Friend is doing everything that he can to resolve them as quickly as possible. There will be an opportunity early in the new Session to discuss this, and I have no doubt that with a little ingenuity the hon. Lady will be able to make her points.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): An ambiguous two-part reply that I received yesterday during Scottish questions implied the electorate registers in Scotland declined by 1 per cent. between 1987 and 1988. As that is likely to be due to the poll tax and its effect on Scotland, should we not discuss that before deciding to pack up, as it is a serious problem for democracy?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman has arrived at an extraordinary conclusion. I cannot find time for a debate on that subject next week.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Has the Leader of the House seen early-day motion 1572, which is supported by 100 Labour Members?

[That this House unreservedly condemns Jaguar management for the sacking of Transport and General Workers Union convenor Tommy Wheeler who, at 18 months from retirement, was dismissed on Friday 4th November for alleged 'gross industrial misconduct'; regards Jaguar bosses' excuse that his 'crime' was not to ask permission for use of a photocopier on union business, although they have accepted this had always been given in the past, as vindictive in the extreme; questions whether the management took their action because the item Mr. Wheeler was photocopying was the regular parliamentary report of the honourable Member for Coventry South East, which contained allegations that during a six week period towards the end of 1987, 17 shop floor workers at Browns Lane had died of strokes and stress-induced illnesses—or whether the company is trying to provoke strikes at the plant in order to ease their cash flow by loss of production and non-payment of wages; and fully supports the industrial action by Jaguar workers in defence of Mr. Wheeler, whose sacking is the latest in a list of victimisations of car industry convenors in Birmingham and Coventry.]

The motion is about the latest vindictive sacking of a car industry convener in the midlands—Tommy Wheeler of Jaguar in Coventry. Would not a debate on that allow us to examine Jaguar's real reasons for dismissing him? Was he really sacked for 20p worth of photocopying paper —albeit paper containing part of a report that I had done on the increase of stress-induced illnesses and deaths in Jaguar, which has lost £20 million of car production this week? Or was Jaguar trying to intimidate trade unions in order to ease its cash flow problems stemming from the declining dollar and to prevent discussion among trade unionists of this appalling increase in illness and deaths at the plant?

Mr. Wakeham: I know that the hon. Gentleman takes an interest in these matters. He knows perfectly well that the House is not the appropriate forum in which to consider such a complaint. If Mr. Wheeler believes that he was dismissed for reasons connected with trade union activity, he can take a complaint of unfair dismissal to an appropriate industrial tribunal.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Will the Leader of the House ask the Home Secretary, who is in his place on the Front Bench, to make a statement today or tomorrow about the request by the city of York for the banning of political marches this coming Remembrance Sunday? Is he aware that the odious and Fascist British National party is planning a gathering and march on that day and that it would be a desecration of an occasion that is sacred to the memory of those who died fighting the very Nazism that that party espouses? Does he agree that this provocative march should be banned?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not know the details, but I know that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will take whatever action is appropriate. I have no knowledge of what that is and no notification that my right hon. Friend wishes to make a statement today or tomorrow.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): May I first record my disappointment, Mr. Speaker, at not having been called during Prime Minister's Question Time? I put this yellow tie on especially for that——

Mr. Speaker: Order. If that is a question to me, may I say that the hon. Gentleman was not alone.

Mr. Banks: I want to point out to the Leader of the House that there is a housing crisis in London and the country. Tomorrow we shall discuss a Bill that will do nothing about the problem of homelessness in the capital or the country, and a debate on housing and homelessness on a motion for the Adjournment is to be pushed off the business. That debate was promised by the Government, so will the right hon. Gentleman provide time for it next week, rather than prorogue on Tuesday?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman is considerably more responsible than I am for the fact that there is not to be a debate on homelessness. The problem was discussed at some length during last night's proceedings. I am sorry that the debate will not take place, as this is an important subject.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Will the Leader of the House bring to the attention of his right hon. and hon. Friends early-day motion 1395?

[That this House believes that customs and immigration formalities on all Channel Tunnel international trains should be carried out on board the trains, and not at passenger terminals.]

The motion refers to the desirability of customs and immigration formalities being conducted on board Channel tunnel trains. If there is any difficulty about the Government's acceding to the wishes expressed in that early-day motion, will the right hon. Gentleman consider holding a debate on the matter at some time in the future?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not think that a debate is appropriate now, but I accept the hon. Gentleman's view that one might be convenient at some time in the future.

For Waterloo-terminating services, airport-type controls are the most practical and cost-effective. The vast majority of passengers will pass through the customs hall with no delay. For services going beyond London, the Channel Tunnel Act 1987 provides for checks to be done on board, subject to adequate facilities being provided by British Rail. Discussions about detailed arrangements are taking place with British Rail.

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): Does the right hon. Gentleman recall that two weeks ago I asked him if he would arrange for a statement to be made on the future of Girobank, in the light of the failure of the tendering procedures? He promised to have a word with the relevant Ministers. Did he, and, if so, what did they say?

Will the right hon. Gentleman assure us that the statement will be made on the Floor of the House, not in a written answer this afternoon to pre-empt the Adjournment debate on Girobank? We should be able to ask questions, since this is a major piece of privatisation that does not require legislation.

Mr. Wakeham: I did have a word with my right hon. Friend. As a result of my representations on behalf of the hon. Gentleman, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster will be replying to the hon.

[Mr. Wakeham]

Gentleman's Adjournment debate tonight. I hope that will satisfy him. As far as I know, there are no plans to answer questions this afternoon.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Will the Leader of the House more fully address the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds)? What is actually happening on 21 November? Is there to be a lighting experiment? If there is, at what time will it take place, and are Members of the House precluded from attending?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not think that I have any power to stop Members coming into the Chamber, but I think that the Select Committee should be allowed to get on with its work.

Mr. Faulds: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take the statement first.

King's Cross Fire (Fennell Report)

4.9 pm

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Paul Channon): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a further statement about the disastrous fire at King's Cross underground station on 18 November 1987. I am publishing today as a Command Paper the report by Mr. Desmond Fennell QC on his investigation under the Regulation of Railways Act 1889 into the causes and circumstances of this terrible disaster. The House will join me in renewing on this occasion our expressions of condolence to the bereaved and sympathy and best wishes to the injured.

The House will also join in paying tribute to the many people in the emergency services, the staff of London Underground, the public, and the doctors and nurses who showed courage and dedication and gave help in this disaster. I repeat in particular Mr. Fennell's words that a large number of members of the London fire brigade behaved with conspicuous courage and devotion to duty. He particularly mentions station officer Townsley, who died a hero's death, and also the great courage shown by police constable Hanson of the British Transport police, which must have enabled many people to escape with their lives.

Mr. Fennell has concluded that the fire was started by a discarded match falling into accumulated grease and debris on the track of the escalator, and that it accelerated up the trench of the escalator until it burst into the booking hall causing the deaths of 31 people.

Mr. Fennell has made 157 recommendations. He regards 33 of these as most important and a further 59 as important. Action is of course already under way on many of them. Many of the recommendations require specific action by London Underground Ltd. to prevent a recurrence. They do, of course, include the most urgent removal of wooden panelling from escalators. I have asked London Regional Transport to have all these recommendations dealt with promptly. Considerable amounts will have to be spent. The plans announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 1 November already provide in full for all the proposals already put to me for spending on underground safety totalling £266 million over the next three years.

The investigation has shown major shortcomings requiring a new approach to safety management and fire prevention in the underground and specific safety audits by London Regional Transport. I am calling on both bodies to put urgently into effect new arrangements recommended by Mr. Fennell.

An enhanced approach is also required from the Railway Inspectorate and I have discussed Mr. Fennell's recommendations with the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission. I have every reason to expect that the present recruiting campaign will bring the inspectorate fully up to complement by the end of January. It will need to be further strengthened for the tasks that Mr. Fennell identifies, including the use of the powers of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 to enforce measures needed for the safety of passengers on the Underground and, I must add, on other railways. The chief inspecting officer of railways is now organising a special investigation of London Underground with support from the Health and Safety Executive. It will examine the safety management systems and monitor the implementation of planned safety measures, and will be completed in March.

The lessons of this report go wider than London Underground and London Regional Transport. I have today written to the chairman of the British Railways Board inviting the board to consider the lessons of Mr. Fennell's report for the management and audit of safety. Letters are also being sent to the chairman of the passenger transport authorities in Tyne and Wear and in Strathclyde.

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary will shortly bring forward regulations under section 12 of the Fire Precautions Act 1971 to require specific measures at Underground stations. This is the speediest means to introduce enforceable standards without uncertainty. The railway operators and fire authorities will be consulted on them. My right hon. Friend is commissioning special studies of the best methods to control the spread of smoke. These present difficult technical problems.

There are also lessons for the emergency services. Copies of the report are being sent to the London fire brigade and London ambulance service. I shall be considering its implications for the British Transport police, and my right hon. Friends concerned will be considering its implications for the emergency services for which they have responsibilities.

I have to deal with two particular matters. As regards the costs of representation at the investigation, after taking into account the special circumstances of this case, I am accepting in full Mr. Fennell's recommendations.

Secondly, on the position of individuals, following the fire, Sir Keith Bright offered to resign as chairman and chief executive of London Regional Transport. I asked him to stay during a difficult period, and he did. He has asked me again to accept his resignation, and I have now done so. Dr. Tony Ridley is a member of the board of London Regional Transport, and the chairman and chief executive of London Underground Ltd. He also has given me his resignation, which I have accepted. I shall make fresh appointments in due course, and meanwhile Sir Neil Shields, who is a member of the board of London Regional Transport, has at my request agreed to take on the chairmanship.

I conclude by expressing to Mr. Fennell and his assessors my warm thanks for a very full and thorough investigation. We must all ensure that the lessons of this tragedy are fully learnt and fully applied. The Government will play their full part to ensure that they are followed up as quickly and as vigorously as possible.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): On behalf of the Opposition, may I express our condolences to the bereaved and join in the tributes to the bravery shown by the people in our emergency services during this terrible tragedy. I congratulate Mr. Fennell on his report and recommendations. The inquiry was limited by the terms of reference laid down by the Secretary of State and that prevented a fuller examination of the real causes of this tragedy. Those causes included the climate created in London Underground Ltd. by the obsession with reducing costs through the continuous reduction of manpower and resources affecting safety, and the need for the responsibility for Underground safety to be transferred to the independent Health and Safety Commission.

Clearly one would like to have had the report for the three weeks that it has been available to the Secretary of State. I hope that he will confirm that there will be an early opportunity to debate the report and its implications for the future. The report makes clear that the responsibility for the monumental failure to provide the adequate safety standards that the travelling public have a right to expect lies directly with the highest level of management which enthusiastically implemented such a disastrous policy. There will be few regrets among Opposition Members at the departure of that management.

Can the Secretary of State inform the House in more detail of his reasons for refusing Sir Keith's offer to resign immediately after the tragedy? Was that refusal based on the fact that Sir Keith and Dr. Ridley successfully achieved the policy objectives of increasing revenue and of reducing costs, staffing and subsidies spelt out in a letter of 20 July 1984 by the present Secretary of State for the Environment to the chairman, Sir Keith Bright? In that letter there is no mention of the importance of obtaining the high levels of safety that are necessary in a public transport undertaking. That letter is a disgrace and was a contributing factor to this terrible tragedy. Sir Keith Bright's success in agreeing to reach these objectives presumably influenced the Government to recommend him for his knighthood.

Does the Secretary of State accept that, as the inquiry report shows, there exists among London Underground management a feeling that the financial climate ruled out proposals to increase spending in certain areas? These clearly involve the vital areas of safety, equipment, maintenance and staffing which were subordinated to the overall objective of increasing revenue and reducing subsidy as required by the Government. Would it not have been better to use those subsidies for the investment in safety that the Secretary of State now proposes in his statement? Does he agree that that would have been better than saving money for the Treasury? If those subsidies had been used earlier, the tragedy might have been prevented.

Is the Secretary of State aware that, since this terrible tragedy, there have been four fires per week to which the London fire brigade has been called, and a serious fire every two weeks within the London underground system? What reassurance can he offer to the House that proper precautions are being taken to avoid such disasters? Is he aware of the growing safety fears of Underground passengers, as detailed in the Evening Standard poll last Friday?

Will the Secretary of State now accept that the institutional changes in the safety responsibilities that he has just mentioned will not be accepted as sufficient by Opposition Members? His promise to bring his Department's safety inspectors up to the proper level is an indictment of his Department's attitude to the enforcement of safety in this matter. Will he now seriously consider the possibility of transferring the responsibility for underground safety matters from his Department's Railway Inspectorate to the independent Health and Safety Commission?

Finally, does the right hon. Gentleman accept that, as Secretary of State for Transport, he and his predecessors bear a great deal of responsibility for this disaster? His predecessor—the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley), now Secretary of State for the Environment—assured me in the House that, in transferring responsibility for London Transport from elected London representatives to himself, the Secretary of State for Transport would be directly responsible and accountable for safety matters. Will he now accept that responsibility by following the example set by London Underground's most senior managers and tender his own resignation?

Mr. Channon: I endorse what the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) said in the first part of his remarks, but I disagree fundamentally with everything else that he has said to the House. In particular, he has misrepresented the position of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment when he was Secretary of State for Transport. He has misrepresented my right hon. Friend's letter, in which he set out the objectives of London Regional Transport. My right hon. Friend referred at the beginning of the letter to the Act setting out the framework of duties for the board and chairman of LRT. Safety is laid down as a paramount objective under section 2(2) of that Act.

Mr. Prescott: There is no safety in that.

Mr. Channon: The Act sets out the framework of duties. It is typical of the hon. Gentleman that he should misrepresent my right hon. Friend's attitude. If I am to be told that the Underground was better run when it was under the control of the Greater London council, I shall ask the House to bear in mind the level of investment at that time which led to great neglect of the Underground and which has taken a long time to remedy.

The hon. Gentleman asked a number of other questions. He implied that the fire was the fault of the Government as they had reduced costs. The inspector stated:

"In my judgement there is no evidence that the overall level of subsidy available to London Regional Transport was inadequate to finance necessary safety-related spending and maintain safety standards."

The House will have the chance to study that paragraph. [Interruption.] On the contrary, I have quoted the sentence and the paragraph. The inspector went on to say:

"I accept the evidence of the most senior management in London Regional Transport and London Underground that if funds were needed, funds were available."

[Interruption.] If I do, my case will become stronger, not weaker. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has taken that tone in this sad and difficult situation.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): Dishonesty.

Mr. Channon: The action that I have taken and the fact that Mr. Fennell's safety recommendations are now being carried out lead me to the view that the most energetic steps are being taken to remedy the deficiencies suggested in the report.

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the chairman of London Regional Transport was right to offer his resignation immediately after the tragic disaster, but that, equally, my right hon. Friend was right not to accept it when action was needed and the person concerned was familiar with the overall situation and no inquiry had taken place which gave any indication of the cause of the tragedy?

Mr. Channon: I entirely agree with my right hon. Friend. That was why I asked Sir Keith Bright to stay on. During the inquiry, it was essential to have Sir Keith at the helm. That was the right course at that time.

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): First, I thank the Secretary of State for his courtesy in supplying me with a copy of the report earlier this afternoon.

I wish to pursue the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that the Act setting up London Regional Transport urges it to bear in mind economy, efficiency and safety? What were the senior management of London Transport to make of an 838-word letter from the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor, the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley), which talked only of economy and efficiency and said not a word about safety? Surely they were to conclude that economy and efficiency were more important than safety.

Does the Secretary of State accept responsibility for the shortcomings of his Department's Railway Inspectorate, which knowingly deployed only one health and safety officer to police the whole of the London Underground and British Rail southern region together? Were he or his Ministers aware that his railway inspectors were insisting on higher safety standards in Hong Kong and Singapore than they were demanding of London Underground?

Finally, it was accepted at the inquiry that Ministers were responsible for safety policy. Will the Secretary of State therefore tell us to which Ministers the chief inspector was referring on day 79 of the inquiry when he stated that Ministers had criticised the Railway Inspectorate for making too many safety demands on London Underground? Will he tell us, from the evidence in the review of the Railway Inspectorate, published in April 1987, who decided that the inspectorate should not check on the maintenance of operating equipment? If any of the Ministers concerned are still in post, surely they should follow the example set by Dr. Bright and Dr. Ridley—and, I hope, the other Ridley—and resign.

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend the Minister of State gave the hon. Gentleman a full written answer on his last point only the other day. No such instruction as he describes was given.

As regards the letter written by my right hon. Friend, the House can see from written answers exactly what my right hon. Friend said. The London Regional Transport Act 1984 states that London Regional Transport should have due regard to "efficiency, economy and safety of operation."

That is not qualified by anything later in the Act.

When my right hon. Friend wrote his letter of objectives to the chairman, at the beginning of the letter he said:

"The Act sets the framework of duties for you".

It is crystal clear that he meant that the organisation should pay attention to efficiency, economy and safety of operation.

Mr. Fennell made some remarks about and criticisms of the Railway Inspectorate. He said that there was not enough "creative tension" between the inspectorate and the Underground. I accept that fully. We must learn the lessons for the future. Four actions have been taken. First, the Railway Inspectorate is setting up a special team with help from the Health and Safety Executive and the London fire brigade to examine the Underground safety management systems and monitor the implementation of the necessary action. Secondly, I have asked the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission for his views on the report. Thirdly, I expect to fill all gaps in the complement of the Railway Inspectorate by the end of January. Fourthly, I have asked the chief inspecting officer to review urgently whether the present complement is sufficient or needs to be increased in the light of Mr. Fennell's report.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Will my right hon.Friend confirm that the tragedy is unique in 60 years of the operation of the London Underground? Will he also confirm that Mr. Fennell's report establishes that the cause was nothing to do with a lack of investment or personnel? Is it the case that LRT has failed to use all the money that it was allocated? How much higher is the investment compared with that of the former Greater London council management?

Mr. Channon: I am glad to say that the accident is unique in the history of the London Underground. Most people would consider that on the whole the London Underground had a very good safety record in many years of operation. The inspector has made specific points on the question whether the cuts—as they are described by the Opposition—in investment or staff led to the disaster. I have already quoted him on the financing of London Regional Transport. He also makes a specific reference to the numbers of staff when he states:

"I found no evidence that the reduction in the number of operating or maintenance staff contributed directly to the disaster at King's Cross."

I hope that that canard can be laid to rest.

As to the question of financing in the past few years, ever since the Government took over from the GLC the annual capital expenditure in real terms has been higher than it was in any of the last five years of the GLC. Today, in real terms, investment in the London Underground is running at double what it was in 1982.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Is the Secretary of State aware that, on 26 October 1987, Sir Keith Bright met a number of London Members of Parliament and expressed deep concern at the directions he was then working under, expressed in a letter reported in Hansard for 20 July 1984 at column 373? Is the Secretary of State aware that that letter requires a reduction in costs of about £95 million a year while maintaining fares at a stable level? Is it not a fact that the budget of the lifts and escalators department of London Underground was cut from about £11 million to £6 million in three years? Whilst the Act to which he referred, the London Regional Transport Act 1984, required, in section 2(2)(b), London Regional Transport to have due regard to safety, does he agree that the cut in the escalators budget to which I have referred shows an undue regard to economy?

Mr. Channon: On that specific point, I can only refer the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) to the conclusions of the inspector, who stated:

"In my judgment there is no evidence that the overall level of subsidy available to London Regional Transport was inadequate to finance necessary safety-related spending and maintain safety standards."

That must be conclusive. The matter has been assessed by the inspector. He made those remarks and I should have thought that that would be enough to satisfy any reasonable hon. Member.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): No one would deny that I do my best to seek investment in the railways and public transport, but is my right hon. Friend aware that the remarks that he has quoted from Mr. Fennell's report seem totally to give the lie to the wild allegations made by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who was giggling when my right hon. Friend began his statement? The hon. Gentleman's attempts to make party political capital out of people's personal tragedies are absolutely nauseating. Can my right hon. Friend——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Please ask a question. Many hon. Members wish to take part in the debate.

Mr. Adley: Can my right hon. Friend confirm that Sir Keith Bright was appointed to his job by the hon. Member for Brent, East (Mr. Livingstone), who appears not to be here this afternoon? If that is the case, would it not be a good thing if the hon. Gentleman turned up——

Mr Speaker: Order. I know that the hon. Gentleman has an interest in these matters, but a great number of hon. Members wish to take part and I think that two questions are enough.

Mr. Adley: Finally, can my right hon. Friend——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I said that two questions are enough.

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend asks about the capital spending. I can refer him to another remark that the inspector makes which is extremely important when the House and the public judge this matter. I very much regret that this discussion has turned into a debate of this nature. As the inspector says:

"There has been a tendency in London Underground in the past for capital expenditure to be less than the budgeted figure."

Far from being restrained, London Underground did not spend money that the Government had authorised it to spend. That proves conclusively that, whatever dirt Opposition Members wish to dish out, their attempt to pretend that the Government are starving London Underground of investment is simply untrue and will not wash.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I point out to the House yet again that after these exchanges we have a very important debate on the immigration rules which is bound to end at 7 o'clock. I ask for brief questions and for hon. Members not to repeat what has already been said.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): I regret that the Secretary of State did not do me the courtesy of letting me have an advance copy of the report.

Is it not the case that the most dangerous thing about the Fennell report is that it gives no precise explanation as to why the fire fireballed? We are offered a simple explanation or a hypothesis. Will he therefore guarantee that there will be further research into the cause of the fire to try to find a preventive cure? Does he accept that it is dangerous complacency to regard the disaster as a unique occasion and a freak fire? That is the way to slip into the slot of failing to take safety into proper account. Will he therefore guarantee that, whatever money is needed by London Underground over and above what is already estimated, that money will be found from the public purse and not through increased passenger fares?

Now that Sir Keith Bright and Dr. Ridley have done the honourable thing, will the Secretary of State tell us why he has not followed the doctrine of ministerial responsibility and offered his resignation; or has that doctrine simply been cast aside in the same cavalier fashion as the Government cast aside their other responsibilities to the travelling public?

Mr. Channon: When the hon. Gentleman has a chance to read the Fennell report in full, I think that he will find that my resignation is not called for. I agree with him about the great importance of finding a precise explanation for the appalling fire. There are some detailed and scientific explanations for what was a unique fire. However, as the hon. Gentleman was quite right to point out, that does not remove the necessity for every step to be taken to ensure that a fire of such a serious nature does not occur again.

As for my not being able to send the hon. Gentleman a copy of the report, under the rules of the House I cannot send every hon. Member a copy of the report. I only wish that I had been in a position to send the hon. Gentleman a copy rather than some other hon. Members.

Mr. Peter Fry (Wellingborough): Does my right hon. Friend accept that Conservative Members dismiss absolutely charges that he should tender his resignation? As those of us who were on the Select Committee on Transport are well aware, as early as the spring of this year his permanent secretary assured the Committee that money would be available to put into effect the recommendations of the report. Many of us feel that the Secretary of State has followed his duty absolutely correctly and should not be made the subject of political criticism by the Opposition.

Mr. Channon: I am extremely grateful to my hon. Friend for his generous support.

Mr. Terry Fields (Liverpool, Broadgreen): Set against the Secretary of State's arrogant attitude in presenting the report today, the staff shortages and the understanding of members of staff that conditions on the London Underground were dangerous to such an extent that staff were disciplined for handing out leaflets only days before the disaster, do not his messages of sympathy ring hollow? They will not bring back station officer Townsley or anyone else. He got away with the Herald of Free Enterprise disaster. Why does he not resign over this disaster?

Mr. Channon: I have already made my position clear. On staff, the inspector said:

"I found no evidence that the reduction in the number of operating or maintenance staff contributed directly to the disaster at King's Cross."

The hon. Gentleman is right about one issue. It is essential in the future to have better trained staff so that they can be more efficient and carry out their duties more effectively. One of the main recommendations of the report points to a lack of effective training in the past.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): Can my right hon. Friend confirm that the paint used at King's Cross station was not responsible for the so-called flash-over effect? If so, can he explain to the House the reason for the rapid spread of the fire?

Mr. Channon: The inspector came to the conclusion that the paint was not responsible for the flash-over effect. Rather than summarise what the report says on that technical matter, I urge my hon. Friend to read the report in full. There is a chapter about the cause of the flash-over. It explains why the fire, which was caused by a match falling into grease and which spread up the escalators, had what, as far as we know, was a unique effect in the history of fires.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I associate myself and my colleagues with the condolences, tributes and thanks expressed by the Secretary of State. Can he confirm that the evidence of the Fennell inquiry is that the tragic deaths followed four years of negligence on safety at the highest levels of LRT management? Is he honestly saying that he and his colleagues bear no responsibility for what happened when LRT is Government instituted and Government run? Given that Mr. Fennell makes it clear in his report that safety was not given such a high priority as productivity and efficiency, what guarantee is there for the travelling public that the next four years will see safety any more highly regarded than it has been in the past?

Mr. Channon: The London Regional Transport Act 1984 and the report make it clear that the responsibility for safety on the railways, not only the Underground, has been and remains the responsibility of the operators. That is the only practical way in which it can be carried out. The hon. Gentleman will know that that is the position on British Rail.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): That is what worries us.

Mr. Channon: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman should say that. The safety record of British Rail has been extremely good.

The purpose of the report is to ensure that action will be taken on safety in the future. That is the purpose of the 157 recommendations, the majority of which have already been agreed, and the 104 action points in the London Underground programme. The report recommends a change in attitude towards safety, and I accept that.

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): Can my right hon. Friend assure us that the 157 recommendations will be implemented and that finance will be available to ensure that they are? Will he call for regular reports from LRT on the progress of the implementation? Is my right hon. Friend aware that in the past year LRT has continued to erect barriers which allow people to go in only one direction and that there is some concern about their safety? Can he comment on that?

Mr. Channon: Mr. Fennell asks for a further review of the new Underground ticketing system to be carried out in conjunction with the London fire brigade and the Railway Inspectorate. I strongly support that and it will be carried out. There has already been one review of that type, and the preliminary view of the fire brigade and the inspectorate is that it is safe. The second review is being carried out.

I can assure my hon. Friend that finance will not be a barrier to any of the recommendations being implemented. The majority of them are already in train, and I shall wish to discuss with LRT all the recommendations in detail.

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): Is the Secretary of State aware that the real tragedy of King's Cross is that for years hon. Members, especially London Members, have brought to the attention of successive Secretaries of State the ongoing problems of London Transport which were repeatedly brushed aside as being irrelevant? Does the right hon. Gentleman ever travel on London Underground? Does he ever travel on the Northern line and see the conditions under which thousands of people have to travel? Has he seen the deplorable stations, and is he aware that many escalators do not work? Where is the safety provision for those people? When will we hear from the Secretary of State that the people who run London Underground are committed to providing proper services coupled with safety and that the balance sheet is no longer the sole criterion for the way in which London Transport operates?

Mr. Channon: As a Member of Parliament for a constituency containing many thousands of commuters, I am experienced in travelling on British Rail and London Underground.

The hon. Gentleman asked about investment in London Underground. As I have said, about £230 million is being spent this year, which, in real terms, is double that spent six years ago. The programme continues to increase. I have announced recently an enormous project to modernise the Central line, which will cost more than £700 million. I have announced a programme for the elimination of the island platform and improvement at the Angel station. I have announced extra rolling stock and improvements at Liverpool Street. There are further announcements to come.

There is massive investment in London Underground and we shall press ahead as fast as we can, consistent with safety, to improve standards. The House, in its more sensible mood, will understand that it is one of the oldest systems in the world and that it is difficult to tackle the problems with the speed that most people would like. However, it will be done with vigour and energy.

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): Will my right hon. Friend accept that the many users of the London Underground will welcome the thoroughness and detail of Mr. Fennell's report and will be reassured by the conclusions he reached and the recommendations made? Will he comment on the need for joint safety training between the staff of London Underground, the London fire service and the London ambulance service, which seemed to be one of the major problems involved in the tragedy turning into a disaster?

Mr. Channon: I agree with my hon. Friend that the report is extremely thorough and makes a number of important recommendations, many of which have already received attention. When hon. Members have time to read the report they will agree that Mr. Fennell should be congratulated on his full report. My hon. Friend is right to point to the importance of joint safety training for the emergency services. That is a point made by Mr. Fennell. I strongly support that and will ensure that it is carried out.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Is the Secretary of State aware that, in his meetings with London Members of Parliament, Sir Keith Bright showed himself to be increasingly unhappy at the financial stringency being imposed upon him by the Government, particularly the elimination of Government grant? If the Secretary of State disputes that, perhaps he will give us the figures for Government grant over recent years. London Underground has been starved of resources and that has led to the virtual elimination of uniformed staff under ground. If he thinks that that is a good thing, perhaps he will speak to the Transport police. There is no doubt that financial considerations were put before safety. Sir Keith Bright only followed orders. The guilty men are those who gave the orders and they can be seen on the Government Front Bench. It is the Secretary of State and his predecessors who should resign, not Sir Keith Bright.

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong. Hon. Members, when they get a chance, should read the report. Chapter 19 deals with the——

Mr. Leighton: What about Government grant?

Mr. Channon: I am dealing with that. Chapter 19 deals with the steady reduction in subsidy and points out that, while the subsidy was being reduced, investment expenditure increased by 48 per cent. in real terms. It goes on to say:

> "In my judgment there is no evidence that the overall level of subsidy ... was inadequate to finance necessary safety-related spending".

Opposition Members, who are seeking to turn this terrible tragedy into a party political issue, are misguided.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): I welcome my right hon. Friend's prompt and effective response to this important report, but will he pay particular attention to the detailed points made about safety on the Underground, one of which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) —ticket barriers? Will he consider whether further action can be taken to limit all smoking on the Underground? I know that that is the technical position, but it is important that it should be enforced.

Mr. Channon: I agree with my hon. Friend's first point, which was raised earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims). I am strongly in favour of making the smoking ban more effective, but it is difficult to see how it can be done. Mr. Fennell makes two recommendations that may be helpful. First, he says that a byelaw should be passed to make it an offence to drop litter on the Underground. If such a measure were introduced, I am sure that the House would give it general approval. Secondly, he recommends that shops on the Underground should not be able to sell material that could later become flammable. That is a matter that LRT will wish to consider, and I have much sympathy with it.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Is the Secretary of State aware that, at a meeting of London Labour Members of Parliament on 26 October 1987, Sir Keith Bright said that he believed that the Government would > "'push us down until something starts to happen', that is until LRT told the Government that there would be material deterioration of the transport service."?

Is it any wonder that Labour Members hold the Government's policies as much responsible for that fire as the match that caused it? If there were any honour left among Ministers, the Secretary of State would resign instead of acting like Pontius Pilate and blaming everyone except himself.

Mr. Channon: I am not blaming everyone else; I am merely reporting the conclusions made in Mr. Fennell's report, which I ask the House to read in full. I am content to be judged by those who read Mr. Fennell's report, who will take full account of the investigation that has taken place. I do not know how the hon. Gentleman can make such remarks about the Underground when over the same period investment has increased by over 50 per cent. in real terms to improve safety and congestion from the pitiful levels of a few years ago.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, and West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that a number of hon. Members served on the London Transport committee of the Greater London council? If any of those hon. Members, including myself, looked honestly at the figures for capital expenditure, they would have to conclude that the amounts allocated since the Government took control of London Transport have been generous to a point that would be surprising. Anyone who served on the committee during that time should be congratulated. Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the major lessons to be learnt is that contact and liaison between the London fire brigade and LRT must at all times be wide and deep? When a fire is reported, the fire brigade must always be called.

Mr. Channon: As the question of finance has been continually raised by hon. Members, the House might like to know that the cash investment figures for 1988-89 are budgeted to be £230 million. When the GLC was abolished, the figure was about £117 million. In real terms, it has increased by over 50 per cent., which gives the lie to those who criticise the Government's investment programme.

My hon. Friend is entirely right about the fire brigade. Until recently, it had not been the practice under any regime for the Underground to call the fire brigade unless there had been an interruption to train services of about 30 minutes. A fire had to be serious before the fire brigade was called. That has been changed completely and the fire brigade is called as a matter of routine, which is to be welcomed.

Mr. Ken Eastham (Manchester, Blackley): Will the Minister apply himself to the issue of the Health and Safety Executive? Is he concerned that it has little influence on safety on the Underground? Agency arrangements have been made whereby London Transport precepts money from the Health and Safety Executive, which has no influence although it provides the money. Is it not time that the arrangements were divorced so that London Transport does not inspect itself? An outside body with influence should make the inspections to replace the present cosy arrangement.

Mr. Channon: I have already had one meeting with the chairman of the Health and Safety Commission. I hope to discuss the report with him in detail, and I shall bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Will my right hon. Friend dismiss with contempt the crude attempts of the Opposition to make partisan capital out of this enormous human tragedy? During exchanges, I distinctly heard the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd), who is an Opposition spokesman on transport, accuse the Minister of dishonesty when quoting from the report. To provide further reassurance, after this exhaustive report, to the millions of people who use London Transport, including myself—the Labour party does not have a monopoly of hon. Members who use London Transport over and under ground—will my right hon. Friend ensure that steps are taken as quickly as possible, within the normal definitions of fire safety and fire brigade certification, to inform the London travelling public that all escalators will be fireproof, within the reasonable definition of that word?

Mr. Channon: Panels will be replaced, as Mr. Fennell has recommended, by July next year, which London Transport says is possible. I am determined that they should be changed, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his wholly justified remarks about finance.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): May I, on behalf of those of my constituents who were bereaved by the fire last November, add my appreciation for the detailed work that Mr. Fennell has done, albeit with severe limitations as to remit? I add my tribute to the emergency services which helped at the fire, many of which were based in my constituency.

The Secretary of State has made much of his decision to bring the Railway Inspectorate for the Underground up to complement in January. What is the currently accepted complement? Why was it not fully in place prior to November 1987? Why were emergency steps not taken in the aftermath of last November to ensure that it was immediately raised to complement?

Mr. Channon: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's remarks in the first half of his question, with which I agree.

The complement of the Railway Inspectorate is 24. I intend to have that fully in place by the end of January, and, as I have already told the House, I am considering whether the Railway Inspectorate needs strengthening in the light of Mr. Fennell's report. It has proved necessary, quite rightly, to have a special recruitment drive and to reconsider salaries. Budget has never been a constraint in the recruitment of railway inspectors, but there have been serious recruitment problems for a number of years.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): Contrary to what the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) said, will my right hon. Friend remind the House that, apart from this one terrible disaster, Underground services must have improved because in the past six years the number of passengers carried has increased by 70 per cent.? That must surely reflect some credit on those concerned.

Mr. Channon: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The number of passengers carried on the Underground has increased considerably. Until this terrible disaster, its safety record was extremely good. I am sure that the House looks forward to the improvements that I have announced, which I hope will reassure the travelling public that every effort is being made to improve safety.

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): The Minister said that if funds were needed they would be made available. I find it difficult to understand why 31 people had to die to provide recommendations for the future. Will the Department of Transport ensure that safety considerations and public transport are completely divorced from any financial constraints that the Government may choose to place on them?

Mr. Channon: Some £266 million has been given to the budget, which was announced earlier this month. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I regard safety as a paramount consideration. The only remark made by the hon. Gentleman with which I disagree is that this disaster had to occur for these measures to be taken. As I have tried to show, the investment programme of London Underground Ltd. has been increased enormously over the past few years.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): The question put by my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) included statistics showing that the number of passengers using London Underground had increased greatly in the past few years. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will agree that it is vital for the interests of London and Londoners that that increase should continue in the future because public transport is vital to all of us in London. Will my right hon. Friend therefore add to the confidence that many people already have in London Underground and London Buses by instituting a full safety audit?

Mr. Channon: Yes; I intend to have a special safety audit of London Underground which will report to me in March. I also intend to have a continuing audit, whereby I receive quarterly reports on safety matters on London Underground from now on. I think that that should reassure people about the improving safety record of London Underground.

Mr. Bernie Grant (Tottenham): The Minister has stated that London Transport did not spend enough money or as much as was available. Which Minister was responsible for monitoring London Transport spending? Does the Secretary of State accept that, when London Transport was run by the GLC, the GLC transport committee monitored both revenue and capital spending very closely? Is not the Minister who ought to have been monitoring London Transport spending in some way responsible for the tragedy?

Mr. Channon: When the GLC was responsible for investment it was not difficult to monitor as it was exceedingly small. In the early 1980s it was about half what it now is in real terms.

Mr. Tony Banks: It was cash limited by the Tory Government.

Mr. Channon: In recent years London Underground has shown a much better record of spending its capital budget than some years ago. As the report points out, over the years there was a tendency for capital expenditure to be less than the budgeted figure. I am glad to say that that has been rectified.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): As one who has used King's Cross Underground station for many years and who went through it on the day in question, I put it to the Secretary of State that the cuts were obvious, even to the travelling public. For instance, ticket collectors were constantly missing and the exit from King's Cross was regularly closed so that everyone had to enter and leave the same way, which was highly dangerous. Is it not a fact that the number of cleaners at the station had been cut from more than a dozen to just two and that that played a role in the fire? Is it not utterly futile for the Secretary of State to talk about how much money was there when we could see the cuts taking place all around us, the effects of which were and still are dangerous?

Mr. Channon: The hon. Gentleman's comments are not borne out by the report, which deals specifically with staffing levels. I have already quoted to the House the fact that the inspector found no evidence that the reduction in the number of operating or maintenance staff contributed directly to the disaster at King's Cross.

The hon. Gentleman makes a good point about the exits. Further instructions will have to be given to ensure that exits are open at the appropriate times.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): In chapter 19 of the report, paragraph 3(i) states:

"There was also evidence that when the budget for escalator cleaning was reduced, the effects were not fully considered at an appropriate level."

Does that not come back to ministerial surveillance of the activities of the Underground? As this is not an isolated instance in terms of recent disasters, which have included Piper Alpha, Zeebrugge, Bradford——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us keep to the matter before us as time is getting on.

Mr. Barnes: My question in connection with transport disasters such as Zeebrugge and the King's Cross fire concerns the possibility of national disaster legislation. In view of our experiences, would it not be appropriate to introduce such legislation based on the United States, Canadian, French and Australian legislation?

Mr. Channon: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is considering the latter point, and I will bring the hon. Gentleman's remarks to his attention. On the first point, I fear that this shows one matter for criticism by the inspector of the management of LRT.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Will the Secretary of State reflect on the fact that it demeans his office to try to brazen out a disaster of this kind and, like Pontius Pilate, to blame anyone but himself and his colleagues in the Government by giving misleading quotations, not quoting the report fairly, and seeking to introduce the superfluous question of investment when 31 people died due to accumulated grease and debris which had nothing to do with capital investment? Does the Secretary of State accept that it was a matter of revenue expenditure and that those people died because of cuts in manning? I put this to him bluntly: has he asked, or will he ask, his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to consider his position? If not, is there no hole into which he will not crawl and no argument that he will not use to cling to office?

Mr. Channon: When the hon. Gentleman reflects on his remarks he will find that they demean himself and his conscience. He should read the report in full before making such a ridiculous series of remarks. They were intended to be offensive and wounding, and they were indeed offensive. I assure the hon. Gentleman that if he reads the report in full he will see that I have given a fair account of it to the House.

Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill

5.5 pm

Mr. Speaker: As I undertook to do yesterday, I have made further inquiries of the Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means about the Division that took place at 9.51 on Tuesday evening. As will be seen from the Official Report, having collected the voices, the Deputy Speaker stated her opinion that the noes had it. As "Erskine May" states on page 400, if the declaration of the result by the Chair is challenged, a Division takes place.

The Deputy Speaker's declaration was challenged, by a shout of Aye, as the Official Report shows, and a Division followed.

What the Official Report does not show, since it was purely mechanical, is that, for the avoidance of any confusion, the Deputy Speaker collected the voices afresh, and then ordered the Lobbies to be cleared. Yesterday there were at least two occasions when the Chair took a similar course when Members did not appear to be totally clear what was happening.

In response to a point of order from the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), the Deputy Speaker indicated that she was satisfied that there was no defect in the procedure by ruling that the Division was in progress. Nothing out of order occurred.

Mr. Stanley Orme (Salford, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I thank you for that explanation. In my view, two matters arise from it.

The first concerns the conduct of private business and the Government's attitude to it, which has made this a highly contentious issue on the Floor of the House. Without putting words into your mouth, Mr. Speaker, I believe that you share some of the doubts about the way in which such business has been handled. When the Prime Minister comes to vote on a private Bill, although there is no Whip, that in itself makes the matter highly contentious.

Secondly, following what you have said, I believe that the matter of the voting procedure should perhaps be referred to the Select Committee on Procedure. There is great doubt, especially among the Opposition, about the developments that have taken place, and although I do not contradict your statement about the factual situation, the position is still highly unsatisfactory from our point of view and I must register that fact in the House.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the right hon. Gentleman. I listened with interest to what the Leader of the House had to say about the Select Committee report on private business. I think that it would be wise for a debate to take place on this so that the House can pronounce judgment upon it.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): On a point of order, Mr Speaker. Yesterday I raised a question about rules and procedures. While not wishing to cast any aspersions at all on the person who was in the Chair, I put it to you that the rules and procedures are clearly laid down and you are the custodian of them. I put it to you that if the rules are breached—I accept your statement that in this instance they were not—nothing that then follows can make that breach correct. I hope that in your ruling you will state clearly that if any such instance occurs in the future the rules will be followed, and it will be hard lines for either side of the House if the procedures are not followed.

Mr. Speaker: I can assure the House that I have considered the matter in great detail. My view is that the rules were followed. It frequently happens in a Division that the occupant of the Chair states, "I think the Ayes have it" or, "I think the Noes have it". The Chair may repeat that twice before the shout of "Aye". Nothing different occurred on Tuesday.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is true that occupants of the Chair often say, "I think the Noes have it" or, "I think the Ayes have it." In fact, it is the sort of statement that is made quite regularly, as it was yesterday—not because there was any doubt, but because it was the phrase to use. It is not that the occupant of the Chair is not sure; it is just a statement. There were continuing votes yesterday right through until the early hours of the morning. The Chairman of Ways and Means used that phrase many times, not because there was any doubt, but because that is the way that things are done.

I asked you yesterday to listen to the tapes, Mr. Speaker. Some may say that "Erskine May" has nothing to do with tapes, but "Erskine May" is a very old instrument of our proceedings. We have tapes available, and anyone listening to a tape of that incident will realise that no Government Member, or any Member supporting the motion, said Aye. There was a distinct shout of "No" —[Interruption.] Listen to the tapes. There was a distinct shout of "No", with the result that the Chair said, "I think the Noes have it," in the traditional fashion, not in a doubtful manner. Members on the Conservative Benches recovered their senses, realised that they had lost the vote and shouted "Aye". I contend that at that point we had won the vote.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know that the hon. Gentleman takes that view, because he said so yesterday. As my predecessors in the Chair have frequently ruled, Hansard is the official record, not the tape. On this occasion there was no discrepancy. The fact that no hon. Member shouted "Aye" on the first time of asking is irrelevant. The Chair's opinion that the Noes had it was challenged. There was nothing different about that procedure—it is followed every day and, indeed, was followed last night.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take further points of order if the House is of the view that the immigration debate is of lesser importance. However, there is quite a demand from hon. Members to take part in that debate, which must end at 7 o'clock. The Front-Bench spokesmen are bound to take some time on it, and that will leave little time for Back Benchers.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your guidance in the hope that we can finally put this matter to rest. Is it not correct that once the occupant of the Chair makes a correct ruling—as, in the eyes of my hon. Friends, Madam Deputy Speaker did the other evening—you have no power to review that decision? Is that not where the matter should rest? Once a decision has been made, it is final. It is the same for any referee involved in any activity.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is correct, and that is what I said to the House yesterday. However, I did undertake yesterday to have further discussions on the matter, and that is exactly what I have done.

Mr. Robin Maxwell-Hyslop (Tiverton): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is important that a wrong ruling is not put on the record. The House should remember that Mr. Harold Lever was credited with having voted when he was not within the precincts of the House. When the matter was raised on a point of order the next day, Mr. Speaker Lloyd, after taking advice—and it was I who suggested that he did so—ordered that a correction be made in the Journal. It is not correct to say that if an error has been made it is incapable of correction. It can be corrected.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is right in what he said about that incident; but it was not what occurred on Tuesday.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am grateful for your ruling, which has cleared away much of the vagueness in my mind —a vagueness which, I admit, is not uncommon. Two aspects still concern me and I ask for your further help.

As a member of the Select Committee on Procedure, I need to be able to speak with some clarity. My first point relates to the emphasis that has been placed on occupants of the Chair at other times and on other occasions. Great importance appears to be attached to the gathering of the voices. I have been directly involved on certain occasions and said "No" to a Government proposal. Business has continued and my "No" has been ruled out of order on the ground that I had not said it loudly enough. That appears to run counter to the ruling that you have just given.

Secondly, you said yesterday that you had no right to review the matter. Do we need your permission to take the matter to the Select Committee on Procedure? Would you be prepared to discuss it with that Select Committee?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not for me to do that. The hon. Gentleman is a member of the Select Committee and the matter is certainly within its terms of reference. Therefore, he should raise it.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I take you back to the events of the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill on 15 July 1986?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. Lady's point of order on the same matter?

Mrs. Clwyd: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am genuinely concerned about the business today. I say again to the House that I hope that I shall not be the recipient of letters from hon. Members saying how sad it was that they were not called to speak in the debate. I shall take the hon. Lady's point of order, but it must be relevant.

Mrs. Clwyd: I hope that it is, Mr. Speaker, as it appears to be a mirror image of what happened on Tuesday. On 15 July 1986 you were in the Chair and we were debating the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill. I moved a new clause on which a vote was called. Hansard records:

"Mr. Speaker: The Question is, That the clause be read a Second time. As many as are of that opinion say Aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

Mr. Speaker: Of the contrary, No. I think the Ayes have it. The Ayes have it. The Question is, That the clause be added to the Bill. As many as are of that opinion say Aye.

Hon. Members: Aye.

Mr. Speaker: Of the contrary, No. I think the Ayes have it. The Ayes have it."

The problem was that the sponsor of the Bill, the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), did not shout "No". He then leapt up and said:

"On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I was, of course, listening carefully to your calls from the Chair on new clause 2 to the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill. Due to the noise in the Chamber I was unable to hear the motion that was put. Consequently——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I put the Question very slowly and I was looking at the hon. Gentleman when I put it. I did not hear any objection to it."—[Official Report, 15 July 1986; Vol. 101, c. 952.]

As a result of your ruling that evening, Mr. Speaker, the debate had to be reconvened on 28 October. It is a mirror image of what happened on Tuesday, so I wonder why the ruling is different.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether the hon. Lady was present, but when the Question was put on Tuesday both "No" and "Aye" were shouted—[HON. MEMBERS: "No, they were not."] I ask hon. Members to read Hansard. The Deputy Speaker said:

"The Question is the motion on the Order Paper.

As many as are of that opinion say Aye.

To the contrary No.

Hon. Members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think that the Noes have it.

Hon. Members: Aye.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Clear the Lobbies."—[Official Report, 9 November 1988; Vol. 140, c. 261-2.]

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At 1 o'clock today, in line with what I understand to be the convention of the House, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), an Opposition spokesman, was provided with a copy of the King's Cross inquiry report, which was embargoed. I understand that that embargo was broken by the hon. Gentleman, who held a press conference and quoted extensively from that embargoed report.

I ask for your protection, Mr. Speaker. I understand that you protect not only Back Benchers, but Labour Front Benchers. If they cannot be trusted to take embargoed information and treat it as such, the Government should not provide them with the information. We need your protection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: That is a matter for the Government. I cannot be held responsible for what individual hon. Members do outside this Chamber.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you and the House accept that when my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) met the press this afternoon, at no time did he make any reference to the embargoed report? Although the pledge from the Department of Transport was that the report would be available at 1.30, it was not available until considerably later, by which time my hon. Friend had written out the notes that he intended to impart to the press—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Member complete his remarks?

Mr. Snape: Conservative Members are always too interested in scoring political points. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East rightly pointed out the discrepancies in the Government's stories of expenditure on London Underground Ltd., and the figures have been readily available for many years. Indeed, they were studied by many Conservative Members before they participated in the exchanges this afternoon. In view of what I have just said, I hope that the hon. Member will withdraw his remarks and refrain from making cheap party political points. He was not present, so, predictably, he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. Speaker: Order. On that note, I think that we should move on.

Immigration Guidelines

5.10 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will confirm that this debate is on a motion which states:

"That this House takes note of the draft revised guidelines for handling Members' representations in immigration cases."

I should be grateful if you would confirm that, if the House takes note of the draft revised guidelines, they carry absolutely no requirement for Members to observe them and are merely for the convenience of Ministers. Will you confirm also that if Ministers in the Home Office were to seek to impose sanctions on those of us who have absolutely no intention of observing the guidelines, we would be in order to call for your protection? I should be grateful if you would confirm the standing and status of the draft guidelines, because it is important that they should be clearly understood before the debate takes place.

Mr. Speaker: I am pleased to help the hon. Gentleman on that point. This is a take-note motion; it is not a motion to approve.

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): I ask the House, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is this a further point of order?

Mr. Bidwell: I am not accustomed to raising points of order, Mr. Speaker, but it is to do with these proceedings. As you know, I have a more-than-average interest in the matter. I went to the Vote Office and obtained the Foreign and Commonwealth Office draft guidelines. I assume that we are also discussing the guidelines that were issued on 18 July. Both documents were issued on 18 July. For that reason, I want to know whether we are to have the presence of a Foreign and Commonwealth Office Minister, because we may wish to put direct questions to him as well as to the Minister with responsiblity for immigration.

Mr. Speaker: At this rate we shall not even have a reply from the Minister.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I say to hon. Members that it is unfair to their colleagues. Every hon. Member would like to have his say, but he must bear in mind the legitimate rights of his colleagues in the Chamber. It is now getting on for half-past 5. This debate must end at 7 o'clock.

Mr. Barnes: My point of order relates to the correctness of the Hansard report on the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill. From what has been said about the matter, and from what you have said, it is clear that there is no mention of the second vote being called for by the Second Deputy Chairman, yet that is supposed to be part of what has occurred. If that is incorrect, what happened when the vote was challenged and the Ayes were called may also be incorrect. You have heard the tapes. Will you confirm that that is what occurred?

Mr. Speaker: I have made a careful and considered statement on that matter. Will the hon. Member please read it? I think that he will find the answer to his question.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Campbell-Savours.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I do not feel that it is necessary to address me with some contempt in the way that you use your voice, Mr. Speaker. The point is that there is a sense —[Interruption.] It is the truth. There is a sense of grievance on this side of the House over the fact that, on that occasion, there was no call from the Government Benches during the course of a Division. The Bill has slipped through, against the wishes of a majority of Members of Parliament as expressed. The Division took place after the business was over. The hon. Member for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) did not shout in the same way as he did on a previous occasion. The hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths) also did not shout. In our view, the Bill should have fallen at that stage. Those who supported the Bill were given a second bite, and we believe that to be absolutely unfair.

There is a sense of grievance that remains on Opposition Benches, which is being talked about in the Tea Room, throughout the House, and throughout the Opposition. Even at this late stage, even though there is no precedent in "Erskine May", that Division should be overturned, and the majority view of the House as expressed before the Division was taken should be the one that holds.

Mr. Speaker: That is not the case. Hansard clearly shows exactly what happened. As I said in my statement, there were at least two occasions when I was in the Chair last night and I had to put the Question a second time for the convenience of the House in exactly similar circumstances. The Hansard record is absolutely clear. I have looked carefully at it again. I have further discussed it with the Deputy Speaker who was in the Chair at the time, and I have ruled that it is in order.

Mr. Terry Patchett (Barnsley, East) rose——

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover) rose——

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) has already raised a point of order on this matter. He may not care much about his colleagues, but I ask him to have some consideration for them. I shall take Mr. Terry Patchett first.

Mr. Patchett: I am worried that the reputation and the democratic procedures of the House were tainted on Wednesday evening. I accept that the two Bills involved were complementary to Government policy, but the official Government Whipping tainted the procedure for private Bills, which left a nasty taste in the mouth of anyone who believes in the democracy of this House. For some reason or other, a "No" Division turned out to be an "Aye" Division. I do not understand it. The ruling taints the reputation and democratic procedures of the House. A "No" vote turned out to be an "Aye" vote. We voted against the motion. Conservative Members may say that a vote was taken, but the House voted not to go through the Lobbies. It was quite clear that there were no Ayes, but there were plenty of Noes.

Mr. Speaker: The easiest thing for me to do is to send my considered statement to the hon. Member, and he will see exactly what happened.

Mr. Skinner: On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker. What has characterised the last few points of order is that some hon. Members who mentioned the matter did not play a part in yesterday's proceedings, but have read Hansard. They listened to the tapes, but they were not involved in the debate. Right across the whole length and breadth of the Opposition there are people who have taken the view that something is wrong with that vote.

You have heard representations from a Tory Member who is well known with regard to procedure, and who has pointed out that corrections have been made. You have also heard my hon. Friend the Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd), who hitherto has not been involved and who told you about a mirror incident in relation to the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill, which was also a private Bill.

We are now dealing with a Bill that will aid and abet that evil regime of South Africa, and some of us will never let this matter drop. It should be looked at further, so I ask you, once again, Mr. Speaker, to listen to those tapes and to come back with a further report before the Session ends.

Mr. Speaker: I have already looked at the matter and have been into it in great detail. I have given my ruling. I call Mr. Renton.

5.31 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Tim Renton): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of the draft revised guidelines for handling Members' representations in immigration cases.

The draft revised guidelines were circulated to every hon. Member in July and copies were placed in the Library. I welcome this opportunity today—even at this late hour—first, to explain our reasons for the draft and, secondly, to outline what the effect of our proposals will be.

Across Government Departments there is a convention of long standing that hon. Members may make representations to the Minister concerned on behalf of a constituent. The House is understandably jealous of that convention. In immigration it played a particularly important role when no appeals system was available, but it has developed beyond that. Hon. Members' representations today are as likely to relate to outstanding applications as to unsuccessful ones. Equally impotant in immigration, an hon. Member's representation is no longer the only way in which an applicant is able to obtain redress. Since 1969 there has existed an appellate system. This is operated independently of the Home Office, as its transfer in April 1987 to the Lord Chancellor's Department has emphasised. It is an effective remedy; for example, in the last four years about 20 per cent. of appeals to adjudicators have been successful.

Because these two systems have developed separately, there are inherent contradictions in the way in which they operate. The current guidelines to hon. Members—which were introduced by my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary in a previous existence in 1986—seek to lay down some ground rules for the inter-relationship between the two systems. I believe that most hon. Members have found these guidelines of considerable assistance.

The guidelines have been a significant document in establishing a clearer understanding of the respective roles of the Department, the independent appellate authorities and the Minister. However, my right hon. Friend the

[Mr. Tim Renton]

Home Secretary and I are concerned to provide a more satisfactory service to hon. Members which, at the same time, enables Ministers to carry out their functions properly. We have looked, too, at the arrangements for hon. Members' "stops", particularly in the light of the new visa arrangements. That was the purpose of our review of the guidelines.

The present volume of hon. Members' representations is an important element. We received 18,000 letters from hon. Members in 1986 on immigration and related matters. Following the visa decision, there were some 13,000 letters in 1987, and the level of correspondence is likely to be the same this year. That means an average of some 250 letters received by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and myself each week. The implications of that are clear. Frankly, with that number of letters, Ministers cannot give detailed personal attention to every case. It is sometimes difficult to pick out the important case and give it the attention that it deserves.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Renton: No, if my hon. Friend will forgive me, I shall not give way because time is short and I think the House would like me to make progress so that as many as possible Back-Bench Members from all parties may speak. I hope that my hon. Friend will make his own remarks if he is able to catch the attention of the Chair.

Better arrangements are therefore needed. Our proposals relate, first, to correspondence and, secondly, to "stops". The draft revised guidelines make two changes in relation to correspondence: first, they make explicit for the first time what is our long-standing practice, that Ministers will not normally intervene to take the decision in outstanding entry clearance and after-entry applications.

There will obviously be exceptions to the normal rule. An hon. Member's letter may explain why an urgent decision on a case is needed, and I may be able to convey that decision in my reply. We shall, as at present, operate the system flexibly. But where there are no special considerations, my reply will simply indicate, as fully and helpfully as possible, where progress on the application now stands.

Secondly, the guidelines introduce arrangements to enable hon. Members to correspond direct with the immigration and nationality department on routine inquiries. This change addresses directly our concern to provide hon. Members and their constituents with the best possible service. I shall return to the arrangements for it in more detail shortly.

Our proposals for "stops" involve two changes. The first results from experience of the changes in permitted "stops" introduced in November 1986. At present, a "stop" in relation to a passenger refused entry because he did not have the entry clearance required under the immigration rules will be permitted only if there are exceptional and compelling circumstances. A "stop" for other passengers will be permitted where there is new and compelling evidence which was not available to the immigration officer. In both cases, the passenger has a full right of appeal from abroad.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood) rose——

Mr. Renton: With respect to the hon. Lady, I should prefer to get on. I suggest that she makes her remarks during the debate and hope that she catches your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Because this appeal right is available, the change we therefore propose is that for any passenger refused entry, whether or not the immigration rules require him to have an entry clearance, a "stop" will be permitted only if there are exceptional and compelling circumstances which the immigration officer has had an opportunity to consider but has not taken sufficiently into account.

The effect of this change is that, in all cases, hon. Members will first need to be satisfied that there are exceptional and compelling circumstances which merit special treatment and, secondly, that the immigration officer must be given an opportunity to consider these special circumstances. This reflects the position in law that the power to give or refuse leave to enter the United Kingdom is exercised by immigration officers. With the final version of the revised guidelines, we shall provide hon. Members with fuller details of contact points at the ports and airports; immigration service officers at senior grades will normally be available to discuss cases of difficulty with hon. Members. If an hon. Member is satisfied that the exceptional and compelling criterion is met and that the immigration officer was aware of it before refusing a request for deferment of removal, he or she may contact my private office direct, or out-of-hours the Home Office duty officer, to request a "stop". I should emphasise that in all cases where an hon. Member wishes to request a "stop", he should contact my private office or the duty officer, not the port or the immigration department.

The second change again reflects the existence of an appeals system. It affects deportation cases and illegal entry cases which have been reviewed by the courts. All cases leading to deportation have rights of appeal, which are exercised before removal. Similarly, no illegal entrant whose case is to be reviewed by the courts is removed before that review is complete. We have therefore decided that where an appeal has been dismissed and the removal arrangements put in hand, it is wrong to continue to allow "stops" which require the Minister to review again, on the same facts, a decision on which an independent review has already taken place. In future, a "stop" in such cases will be allowed only where there is new and compelling evidence which has not previously been taken into account. The position on "stops" for illegal entrants whose cases have not been reviewed by the courts remains unchanged. The procedure will be the same as I have described for port "stops". My private office or the duty officer should be contacted direct if a "stop" is to be requested.

We are also proposing a common time limit for the submission of representations in "stop" cases. The time limit in the current guidelines ranges between 12 and five days. Because under the new system the hon. Member will have available details of the particular circumstances behind the "stop" request, we have set a time limit of five working days for the receipt of representations. Where the Minister upholds a decision to remove, the delay of four working days between the date of the Minister's reply to the hon. Member and removal remains unchanged. As at present, hon. Members should continue to contact the port direct where the issue is whether a passenger under refusal should continue to be detained or be granted temporary admission. That is not a matter in which I would normally expect to intervene.

I mentioned briefly earlier the new arrangements to enable hon. Members to communicate direct with the Department if they wish. That is not a totally new idea. Hon. Members already write direct to local tax offices, local social security offices and so on. Many also already write direct to regional passport offices and I hope that they will continue to do so. We have, therefore, devised new arrangements so that hon. Members may, if they wish, write directly to the immigration and nationality department. Details are contained in the annex to the draft guidelines and the relevant telephone contact point will of course, be included in the final version of the guidelines.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Renton: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to make his observations in a speech during this short debate.

Much of hon. Members' routine correspondence may benefit from this approach. A random sample of one week's letters from hon. Members suggests that one third could well be routine inquiries. We envisage that it will provide a swifter and therefore better service for hon. Members on routine matters and, equally important, that it will free Ministers to deal with the difficult cases which merit careful scrutiny.

Hon. Members may also be aware that similar arrangements to those being set up at the Home Office will be introduced at the same time at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. In answer to the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell), may I say that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, who regrets that he cannot be present, wrote to all colleagues in July to give advance notice of these new arrangements. They will deal with routine inquiries from hon. Members about immigration applications made overseas. A special unit will be set up to handle these inquiries. It will, equally, remain open to hon. Members to make specific representations to FCO Ministers direct.

I should like to take this opportunity to announce an important proposal to improve the service that my Department provides to Members of Parliament and to members of the public.

Mr. Madden: The closure of Lunar house.

Mr. Renton: Not at all. Something rather different.

Hon. Members will be pleased to learn that the Government wish in principle to establish a regional public inquiry office in Birmingham. We have set in hand consultations with staff and their representatives with a view to recruiting and training personnel for the new office as soon as possible. I hope to be able to announce further details later in the year. I know that many hon. Members have in the past suggested a regional public inquiry office to help members of the public with their immigration problems. This announcement today will be welcomed by all who are anxious to see my Department provide an improved standard of service for those personal callers who wish to resolve their particular immigration problems over the counter.

In that context, I can tell the House that the benefits of the changes in the immigration rules, against which the Opposition foolishly voted earlier this year, are now beginning to show and that at Lunar house both the public inquiry office and the telephone inquiry bureau are offering a much improved performance. [Interruption.] We are taking active steps to recruit additional staff, and I am sure that the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) will be the first to join me in sending good wishes from the House to all those members of staff and management who have worked so hard to make these improvements possible. We are taking active steps to recruit additional staff, including part-timers, and have started a major recruitment advertising campaign. At the same time we are introducing, wherever possible, improved working procedures to ensure that applications are processed as promptly as possible.

Finally, it is a parliamentary convention that hon. Members deal with their own constituency matters and not, save in exceptional circumstances, with one another's. We attach particular importance to that principle in dealing with immigration matters.

Ms. Short: But it is only a convention.

Mr. Renton: I referred to it as a convention. I recognise that some hon. Members have a particular specialist interest in immigration and that some people first arriving in this country with no links will not have an evident constituency Member and so are likely to approach the Member for the constituency in which they first arrive or first find accommodation, but these are exceptions to the general rule. My office will continue its practice of normally accepting representations only from the constituency Member. The draft revised guidelines remind hon. Members of this convention, and we have taken this opportunity also to record our practice that the constituency is normally interpreted as the constituency in which a person lives, rather than works, although obviously in many cases these may be the same.

I emphasise that the revised guidelines are in draft form. If points are made during today's debate, or if hon. Members wish to write to me about them in the next few days and it seems to us sensible to include them in the final version of the guidelines, we shall do so. These are sensible and balanced proposals aimed at giving a better service to Members of Parliament, consistent with immigration procedures and the independent appeal system. I recommend them to the House.

5.46 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): I cannot begin without saying how unsatisfactory it is that the House is left with an hour and a quarter to debate these matters. We had nine minutes of wholly legitimate points of order before we began. Had they not been put, we would have been left with one hour and 20 minutes. That is wholly unsatisfactory for debating a topic which concerns the rights and interests of hon. Members and, far more important, the welfare and perhaps the lives of men and women who seek entry to this country.

I shall be brief and not give examples to substantiate the general points that I shall make, but I assure the Minister that I, and no doubt my right hon. and hon. Friends, can provide examples to substantiate every one of the fears and doubts that overcome us when we consider these proposals.

I welcome the announcement that an office is to be opened in Birmingham. That is long needed, much appreciated and absolutely essential. I take it for granted that interviews will be held in Birmingham and that families living in that area will not be required to travel to Felixstowe or to London. I take it from the Minister's silence that that obvious reform is what he has in mind.

This is an arbitrary extension of the powers of the Government and, like all such arbitrary extensions, it is dressed up with the pretence that it is done solely to improve efficiency. That is the traditional excuse for authoritarian action which may be and often is crucially damaging to the interests of men and women who are entitled, even under the present rules, to enter this country, but who are wrongly prevented from doing so by the present method of immigration screening.

For the three categories particularly affected—immigrants refused entry, temporary residents threatened with removal and applicants facing long delays—it is often only the intervention of Members of Parliament which prevents them from being subject to unchecked action by the Executive. The object of a parliamentary system is to allow the legislature to check the Executive in matters of general policy and specific application. The only check that exists on the behaviour of the Executive in the specific application of immigration rules is for Members of Parliament to intervene in specific cases of visitors, asylum seekers and alleged illegal entrants.

It is no good the Minister saying that there is a perfectly adequate system of appeals which does not involve Members of Parliament and therefore Members of Parliament can in part be detached from the entire process. Many of the people who come to this country to visit relations are entitled to do so. Others are asylum seekers, in fear and at risk of their lives if they stay in their home country.

Some are visitors who have not overstayed but who are suspected of doing so. Such people are not best equipped to deal with the complicated Home Office bureaucracy and, if they are able to deal with it, they do so under two adverse circumstances. First, there is the intolerable delay. One of the main jobs of an hon. Member in this area is to try to speed up the Home Secretary and his Department. We all have letters from a year or more ago that tell us that the Home Office will reply as soon as practically possible. That is often 14, 15, 16 or 17 months later. The hon. Member's job is to find justice in terms of time.

Ms. Short rose——

Mr. Hattersley: I shall finish my speech quickly as I do not want to stand in the way of my hon. Friends who also want to speak.

The second reason why the intervention of the Member of Parliament is essential is that the appeal system does not offer any real redress to the majority of people who are found to be unsuitable in their application to enter but who should have been allowed in in the first place. Let us suppose that a man from Islamabad comes to this country for a religious festival or a wedding in—I pick an example at random—the Sparkbrook constituency. If he is turned away, it is no consolation to him to say that all he has to do is to return to Pakistan and appeal, and that he may be let in in a year and a half's time. The wedding will be over and it may be impossible to finance another trip after making an appeal. It is possible to appeal only after returning to the port from which the trip has been originally made. That is not an appeal in practical terms.

The Minister, in his circular and in his argument today, has failed to suggest that the general duty of Members of Parliament to intervene on behalf of constituents is in any way protected by the exceptions that are made in the circular. I shall not read them all, but we are told that Members of Parliament may have the opportunity to place a stop on immediate removal if he or she can demonstrate that there are exceptional and compelling circumstances or if there is new and compelling evidence, according to the different categories of intervention.

That is wrong in principle and unworkable in practice. It is the civil servant against whom we appeal who decides whether an appeal is possible. The matter goes to the Minister only by the good will and grace of the civil servant, so the idea that Members of Parliament have any rights in those matters is wrong.

I should like to give an example, which I think the Minister has heard about already. Two months ago, a professor of mathematics at a British university, whom I know only by reputation, was returning to London from a mathematics conference at McGill university in Canada. He discovered, to his delight, that he was sitting next to a professor of mathematics from an Indian university, who was renowned throughout the world as an expert in some branch of the subject. To the Indian professor's delight, the British professor said that he had four graduate students who would like to talk to him. He asked him to stay overnight and come to the university. The Indian professor agreed, but when he innocently got off the plane in London, he was arrested, incarcerated and told that, as he had no visa, he must return the following day.

I telephoned the Minister's private office and was told that it was not a matter for ministerial intervention. The Minister's private secretary said that the Minister was away for the weekend and could not be disturbed, but, after he had been disturbed, the message came back that it was not a suitable case for intervention by a Member of Parliament because there was nothing urgent about it—nobody was dying. I confess that I can think of compassionate cases, involving sickness or physical necessity, which are more urgent than that. However, the response from civil servants when we ask for ministerial intervention clearly makes nonsense of the idea that there are exceptions. We oppose the measures because the exceptions are vitiated by the fact that only the civil servant is allowed to decide whether an exception applies.

I want to speak briefly about correspondence with the Home Office. I intend to send all immigration letters to the Minister and I expect serious answers from him. I do not expect him to write to me saying that the matter has been passed to Lunar house. It is intolerable that Members of Parliament should be told that they are not entitled to receive the Minister's judgment. It is no good the Minister saying that the work is too much for him. The truth is that if we are dealing with any subject, other than ethnic minorities and the immigration of ethnic minorities, additional resources would be made available and there would be a Minister who was able to deal with the job as it went along.

Mr. Renton: The right hon. Gentleman is making a mountain out of a molehill. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary wrote to him on 18 July and gave an undertaking that hon. Members will receive full replies directly from the Minister, if they specify that. The right hon. Gentleman knows that. However, once the guidelines come into effect, we shall obviously not feel able to intervene in any case where the guidelines indicate to the contrary. We shall, of course, provide to any hon. Member who writes to us the information that is available about the application and the stage that it has reached. I hope that that sets the right hon. Gentleman's fears at rest.

Mr. Hattersley: The Minister has done the opposite. He has referred to my correspondence with the Home Secretary, so I shall remind him of its terms. After a meeting with some of my hon. Friends, I went to the Home Secretary and said that in future we would write to him and we expected him to reply to us. He was courteous enough to say that he would reply. I give notice that I intend to take up and persist in that offer. I shall expect him to give genuine consideration to the letters rather than to write a Lunar house letter in another guise. My hon. Friends and I are not prepared to see the interests of our constituents subject to the inadequacies and inefficiency of Lunar house. I gladly join the Minister in extending good wishes—and sympathy—to the people who work at Lunar house. The problem is not the people who work there but the burdens that the Minister has placed on them with unnecessary and arbitrary immigration regulations.

Ministers have an obligation to satisfy hon. Members that their constituents' interests are being properly respected and looked after. I do not accept that a Minister should determine what is a routine matter and what is a matter of principle. It is quite routine to send a letter saying that one expected a reply a month ago or was promised a reply two years ago if one is expecting furniture to be delivered, awaiting the availability of a new car or inquiring about the time that it will take to tarmacadam a road. In immigration cases, timing is essential. We are not in a mood to be told that Ministers will not co-operate with such routine.

The drift of the Minister's proposals is more important than the details. In the past eight years, hon. Members have become increasingly detached from arguments about imigration cases, as the Government wish. An attempt is being made to exclude us from defending the rights of constituents. That is parallel with the Government's consistent determination to keep out greater numbers of legitimate immigrants and visitors and to pursue the casual overstayer—the innocent overstayer—with a severity that the misdemeanour does not warrant.

5.59 pm

Mr. Timothy Raison (Aylesbury): Having held the job that my hon. Friend the Minister of State holds, I should say that I greatly admire the patience, good sense and courtesy with which he carries out his ministerial responsibilities and that I believe that he is right to propose these changes.

It is absurd that literally thousands of cases should go to Ministers for their decision—especially visitors' cases in their present quantity. It is also absurd that Ministers should be regarded as a regular court of appeal against decisions made under the statutory appeal process. My hon. Friend is right to want to tackle the problem. It is like the Home Secretary being asked to decide thousands of cases on appeal against decisions in the magistrates courts. Ministers should not have to tackle problems on that scale, but that is what is happening with immigration cases at the moment, and it is right to try to get to grips with the problem. Ministers should be able to concentrate on the really important questions that will have a decisive influence on the life of the immigrant concerned. The enormous burden of less important cases makes it remarkably hard for Ministers to concentrate on such issues.

The question has always been: what should we do about the problem? I have to confess that in my time we failed to do anything effective and merely operated the system. In theory there was always the attractive option —an option favoured in the Wilson report—of setting up an immediate court of appeal or adjudication system that could pick up cases virtually the next day and decide whether immigration officers had made the right decision. We have to acknowledge that the scale of visitor entrance and the multiplicity of ports of entry have made that a practical impossibility, and we therefore need the kind of approach contained in the draft guidelines.

At this stage—the stage between the publication of the draft guidelines and the appearance of the final guidelines —my hon. Friend should consider one or two matters carefully. First, I do not entirely agree with the wording of the draft guidelines as they affect the philosophy of how to approach constituency cases. There is a firm convention in the House that we do not pick up each other's cases—certainly not without permission—but that is based on respect among hon. Members, and Ministers should avoid putting themselves in a position in which they may be seen to be policing that convention. I hope that my hon. Friend will think again about the present wording, which seems to me to imply—to a greater extent than is wise—that Ministers will determine this issue. I have never heard of Ministers in other Departments saying that they will not pick up a case because it comes from outside the constituency of the hon. Member concerned, and it would not be right for the Home Office to take that view. I do not think that such a change would undermine what my hon. Friend seeks to do, and I hope that he will think about it carefully.

Mr. Marlow: Will my right hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Raison: No. I shall follow the practice of not giving way.

Secondly, it should be made explicit in paragraphs 9 to 14 that, although the members of the Minister's private office will take certain actions' regarding removal or otherwise, they are at all times the servants of the Minister. The wording of that part of the guidelines seems to have a flavour of giving them a more free-standing role than is proper. It is only a matter of wording, but the Minister must always be responsible for the actions of his private office and there should be no doubt about that in the guidelines, although over the years successive Ministers, including myself, have been superbly served by those in their private offices.

I am not sure that I entirely agree with the statement in paragraph 10 that removal will be deferred only where there are "exceptional and compelling circumstances . . . which the immigration officer has had an opportunity to consider but has not sufficiently taken into account."

[Mr. Raison]

It is right that the guidelines should contain such a provision, but if there is to be further consideration at all we should at least be prepared to consider factors that have not been considered by the immigration officer. The guidelines circumscribe too narrowly the conditions in which matters should be reconsidered. After all, the point of going to the Minister is to bring before him new factors not necessarily considered by the immigration officer.

Let me come to what is in many ways my most important point. The quid pro quo of a speeded-up system that rightly imposes fewer burdens on Ministers is that there must be an acceleration of the rate of handling of appeal cases. We all know that in many cases it takes far too long to deal with appeals. I know that my hon. Friend is very keen to improve the administrative machinery. He has taken a number of effective steps, and we were glad to hear his announcement today. Nevertheless, I hope that he will do all that he possibly can to ensure that the appeal process is speeded up. I know that much of the responsibility for that lies with the Lord Chancellor, but it is a matter for the Government, and it is a matter of great importance.

My hon. Friend did not touch on one aspect of the process which has concerned the House. Perhaps he can report on whether the new guidelines on asylum cases, which were very much improved after a good deal of discussion, are working satisfactorily.

Having said that, I believe that my hon. Friend is right to introduce procedures. I hope that he will think about the points that I have made but I shall certainly support him if there is a Division tonight.

6.6 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I was surprised to hear the Minister say that he proposed to introduce the guidelines with the intention of improving the service to Members of Parliament. I am not aware that hon. Members have shown any sign that they are dissatisfied with the service that they have had—in the sense in which the Minister has interpreted it. I should be interested to hear whether any of the proposals arise from recommendations made by hon. Members who have had occasion to deal with him frequently on immigration matters. The House feels that the changes in the guidelines have more to do with administrative convenience than with the strengthening of hon. Members' democratic effectiveness.

Immigration cases obviously are exceedingly difficult for officials to handle, and it can bring Governments into disrepute with foreign Governments if they are not properly handled. It is wrong to treat hon. Members as though they are in some sort of adversarial relationship with the Home Office and its Ministers and officials when they are seeking by their intervention to make the handling of a case more sensitive and to ensure that there is no miscarriage of justice.

The fact that rules are being tightened to reduce hon. Members' effectiveness and limit the circumstances in which hon. Members can intervene will transfer to hon. Members a considerable amount of work that should properly be handled by officials and Ministers. They are to be expected to make difficult judgments about whether exceptional and compelling circumstances exist which have or have not been taken into account in the quasi-judicial procedures. I believe that hon. Members' duties are properly discharged if they make a prima facie judgment, but what is now proposed is that hon. Members should establish—as though they were a court with the ability to sift and evaluate evidence—whether certain factors have been sufficiently taken into account. That is especially true in respect of visitors, those seeking asylum and illegal entrants. They are asked to judge whether there is new and compelling evidence.

I admit that the Minister did not have much time to explain the matter to us, but it appeared that he proposed to issue detailed information about what had happened in the judicial review, so that it would be possible for Members of Parliament to consider whether what they had been told was in fact a new point that should be taken into consideration. If that is the case, an extraordinary complexity has been added to the procedure, which, far from simplifying the process, will greatly complicate it.

I do not wish to repeat the points that have been well made by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who speaks with more personal familiarity of these cases than me and many other hon. Members, but I wish to raise one or two points that he did not touch on.

In the case of a person seeking asylum, the Minister apparently will not agree automatically to defer removal where there is a safe third country to which that person may go. How is it to be determined what is a safe country? Is the Minister proposing to issue a list of safe countries? Is it to be countries that are subscribers to international conventions which show that they are suitable places for people to go to? I believe that, if it is a purely subjective judgment being operated by the official, it would be appropriate for Members of Parliament to intervene and give their appraisal. The Minister should not bind himself in advance, but should consider each case on its merits.

On the question of deportation and illegal entry, the Minister's prior decision to intervene only if there is new and compelling evidence appears to be unacceptably binding his hands.

The proposal that the procedures on stops should be exercised within five working days is impossible to present as one which is in the interests of Members of Parliament or those whom they are seeking to serve. In the light of the new heavier responsibility that the Minister is putting on Members to evaluate evidence, it will be much more difficult for them to do so if it has to be packed into that confined time. Speaking as one whose post and communications with Lunar house are perhaps more difficult than those of other hon. Members, I believe that the Minister should look very hard at that proposed reduction from 12 to five days. I cannot see what advantage there is in that.

With regard to the constituency Member and his role, it is a generally correct principle that hon. Members should not take up each other's cases, but exceptions to that should be recognised by the Minister. There are some hon. Members who almost as a point of principle will not take up immigration cases. It is bad for our race relations policy and for our relations with other countries if an individual is deprived of a right by finding himself in such a constituency. I hope that the Minister will take that point into account when interpreting his guidelines on constituency Members.

On the question of a direct approach to the immigration and nationality department, I have no quarrel whatever with a facility being made available which hon. Members in some cases may feel is appropriate. If that reduces the burden of work on Ministers' Departments, that must be welcomed and justified. However, it must not take away the Member of Parliament's judgment whether that facility is the appropriate one to use in the circumstances. The Member of Parliament has a constitutionally important right to be able to call to account the Government through the Minister, and not for the action to be taken in his name by some junior departmental officials.

I recognise that the scale and volume of these cases is such that it is appropriate for the Minister to review the effectiveness of the existing rules, but the size of the problem is to some extent being diminished—partly through substantive changes in the law—and therefore it is not the appropriate time to change the guidelines in the manner recommended by the Minister. I was unhappy about the changes, and especially about section 5 of the Immigration Act 1988, which I believe is doing a number of people grave injustice in removing effective judicial review.

The Member of Parliament's stop is the only safeguard which exists to give an effective remedy to those whose right of appeal can be exercised only once they have left the country, which represents a substantial number of cases. That cannot be satisfactory, and the Minister must reconsider that.

6.16 pm

Mr. Patrick Ground (Feltham and Heston): I believe that the hon. Member for Ealing, Southall (Mr. Bidwell) and I are two of the most frequent correspondents with the Home Office on this subject. That has been confirmed informally, if not exactly statistically. I pay tribute to the Minister's private staff for the way in which they deal with these problems and the courtesy that they extend to hon. Members.

On the last occasion that the guidelines were discussed in the House, my principal anxiety was the large number of visitors with modest means who were arriving in Britain and being turned back at the airport, having been told that they could not afford to come for a holiday. That caused distress to many people. I am happy to say that, by and large, the introduction of the visa system has eliminated that misery at the airport, at least for those who come from the countries about which I am concerned.

My principal anxiety now is about marriages and fiancées joining their husbands-to-be. Undoubtedly there are bogus marriages between people who go off after the formalities have been approved by the Home Office; plainly they never intended to have a genuine marriage. However, I believe that there are substantial numbers of genuine relationships which are not getting through the system. If a marriage was proved to be genuine, either immediately or over a period, I would like it to be made possible for that couple to be able to surmount the hurdles presented by the Act.

It is absurd to say that Members of Parliament cannot get satisfaction from local offices and from individual departments. We receive many thoroughly satisfactory letters from DHSS offices and from inspectors of taxes, and I am prepared to try to get a satisfactory answer from the immigration and nationality department. If I do not, I shall be on to the Minister very quickly.

The matter which concerns me about the guidelines is the time limits, and especially the five-day time limit. Will the Minister ensure that the same conventions for time limits, which were agreed in the previous guidelines, are observed so that there is no change of administrative practice by his Department? It was only the willingness of his Department to accept a holding letter, when one could not get the full representations in within the five days agreed by his predecessor, that actually made the existing system in some cases tolerable. I hope that there will be no administrative changes. I associate myself with the arguments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison), and I hope that consideration of them will continue.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): When the Minister introduced the revised guidelines today he presented them as though they were just and reasonable and were intended to assist hon. Members and perhaps, as a by-product, to assist himself because a burden will be lifted from his shoulders. I do not believe that that will happen. He should ask himself why he receives so many thousands of letters every year from hon. Members. It is because reality is much more stark than he would have us believe.

I want to use this opportunity to express my concern and the concern of many of my constituents who originated in the Indian sub-continent about the long delays that occur when dealing with applications for the entry clearance of their relatives.

I am sure that everyone would accept that someone legally settled in this country is entitled to have his wife and children, below a certain age, to join him here. Many of my constituents, however, face delays of months and even years on receiving decisions on applications they have made for their families to join them in Oldham.

Over the years those delays have built up to such an extent that I took one case to the ombudsman to see if he could investigate exactly what had happened. Some considerable time later the ombudsman prepared a report and submitted it to me. It informed me that the wife of Mr. Ali, the constituent concerned, was interviewed at the British High Commission in Dhaka on 23 April 1986—after the application had been made on 27 March. She was told that her husband would have to be interviewed in the United Kingdom before the matter could be dealt with properly. I received a letter from my constituent complaining about this on 27 March 1987, because, nearly a year later, no further action has been taken. In other words, his wife was interviewed and told that her husband would have to be interviewed here and yet, a year later, that had not happened.

I asked the ombudsman to consider the case, which he examined carefully. He outlined a catalogue of disastrous actions, which I would love to read out to the House, but I know that hon. Members would not want me to delay them. I hope that the Minister will consider the case. One of the examples given by the ombudsman was that the application had been placed on the wrong pile and did not reach the top of that pile as was expected at a certain time. He added:

[Mr. James Lamond]

"unfortunately at about that time the entry clearance officer had suffered serious family problems which had necessitated his absence from the office from July to September during which time no action had been taken on . . . the application. The Principal Officer said that the ECO's outstanding cases should have been taken over by another officer during the ECO's absence, but this seemed not to have happened."

It is all extremely loose and unfortunate, especially for my constituent. I have every sympathy for the entry clearance officer, who was facing some difficulties of his own, but I have just as much sympathy for my constituent. He had to wait a year between when his wife was interviewed and when he was interviewed to see whether she could join him with their children. That placed his marriage under some strain and caused him problems.

Although the Minister may have sympathy for my constituent, he may suggest, as was suggested to the ombudsman, that it was an unusual case. The ombudsman reported:

"The Principal Officer said that the Head of Immigration Section in Dhaka had every reason to believe that this had been an isolated case"

It is not an isolated case. I asked the Oldham council for racial equality to find some similar examples and I could give details of the cases it gave me, but time is short. They include people who were interviewed in Dhaka in the middle of 1986. The second interview of the relatives, to be held in Liverpool, was delayed for eight months. A further interview was required, but that suffered an 11-month delay. Between the three interviews, 20 months had elapsed. After two years had passed no decision had yet been reached. That is not the isolated case of which the ombudsman spoke; it is just one of many cases that can be substantiated.

When the Minister speaks about trying to help us and helping himself, he should think about the people we should help—those people who wait months, even years, for their wives and children to join them. Let us do something to expedite their cases. To suggest that the best thing to do is to write to Lunar house is nonsense.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): The proposals are sound and sensible, and I believe that they should have been implemented long ago because the system was becoming increasingly unsatisfactory and often abused. Few hon. Members would not agree.

I have been as guilty as anyone in seeking stop notices on arrivals, often without being in possession of the full facts. I did it because it was expected of me. Any hon. Member who was approached in those circumstances had to give good justification for not asking the Minster or his office to intervene. It was well known that a stop notice was practically automatic—that is what happened if an hon. Member was co-operative. Because of the weight of correspondence to which my hon. Friend the Minister has referred, people were coming in illegally and staying five or six months before the Home Office dealt with their case.

I am amazed by the dedication that has been shown by my hon. Friend, by his predecessor—the Government Chief Whip—and my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison) who all spent hours and hours on the cases. Given the weight of correspondence imposed upon them, it was impossible for any human being to reach the right judgment in every case. Therefore, the guidelines are right.

The Minister is correct to talk about the need for exeptional and compelling circumstances because we must be able to make representations on those cases which we genuinely believe to be worthwhile. I have had two or three cases recently when my hon. Friend has taken into account those circumstances. They have not all been coloured immigration cases.

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): What colour were they?

Sir Dudley Smith: I can talk about this because I represent an area of high immigration. I want to see justice for those who genuinely want to bring in people who have a right to enter. This issue cuts right across the world. My hon. Friend frequently brings his judgment to bear on compassionate cases, and we are grateful for that.

I wish to sound a note of dissent. I am not sure about this business of writing to Lunar house, except in highly technical cases. People outside this place have a touching faith in Ministers' ability to get things done. As a Member of Parliament of some experience, I have found that if I go to what they regard as second best they will ask me why I did not approach the Minister if they are turned down. So I might have to go to the Minister in the end, anyway. We must certainly reserve the right to approach him if we have any doubts about a case.

In other respects these guidelines are sensible and I hope that they will be ratified. I think they will work smoothly.

6.31 pm

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): The Minister comes before the House as living proof of the Government's incompetent handling of immigration policy during the past 10 years.

On 16 November 1987 the Home Secretary came before the House to tell us that the Immigration Bill, which became the Immigration Act 1988, would provide a better customer service. Let us quickly examine the record: it is a catalogue of incompetence.

At Lunar house, 267,000 letters lie unopened. That has earned the condemnation of the Home Affairs Select Committee, which described events at Lunar house as scandalous. There are delays in dealing with applications for naturalisation of up to two years. It takes nine months for a person wanting to join a spouse here to be interviewed in posts abroad. This year 77,000 passports were at Lunar house until the Minister discovered them, started to photocopy them—not in person—and sent them back to applicants. People have to wait for up to a year for applications for dependants to be considered.

The Immigration Act 1988 came into force on 1 August this year, further restricting the rights of appeal of citizens of this country and of those seeking to come here, and breaking promises made by successive Labour and Conservative Governments. Yet, in his letter of 18 July to hon. Members, the Minister said, in paragraphs two and four, that he intended to provide a better service for hon. Members. We did not believe the Home Secretary last year and we do not believe him now.

A fundamental shift in the rights of Members to intervene in immigration cases is being proposed. Since my election last year as the Member for Leicester, East, I have taken up more than 4,500 immigration cases. I give a third of my parliamentary salary to employ an extra person in my office just to deal with those cases. Each week I send on average 25 letters to the Minister's private office. They do not inquire after his good health; they are inquiries about applications for leave to remain and about delays in cases. Every letter is vital to the people who come to my surgeries and who live in my constituency and in those of other hon. Members. These people have an absolute right to go to see their Members of Parliament, and Members have an absolute right to contact the Minister and expect a reply.

The Minister is trying to transfer the correspondence from his office to Lunar house, which has often been affectionately called Loony house by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden). And what is happening at Lunar house? Two hundred and sixty seven thousand letters lie unopened, the morale of members of staff is low, there are delays, and there is chaos. Apparently, the ability of the immigration service to hold on to staff at Lunar house is so limited that they are losing them daily to the insurance companies in Croydon.

I join in the tributes paid to the Minister's private office, which I have found extremely helpful. When I ring the office, Colette, Sharon, or Trixie or Dixie, or whoever works there, are helpful, and we come to know the people we are dealing with. When we visit the Minister's office we know that his private office lies just outside his door and that members of staff are present to consult him on matters of importance. I do not want to write to Lunar house. I shall join my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) in continuing to write to the Minister.

I welcome the establishment of an office in Birmingham. It would be nice to have a local immigration and nationality office in Leicester, Bradford or Manchester. On the analogy with local tax and DHSS offices, it would be useful to have these offices in our constituencies.

I do not think that the Minister understands the hardship and distress that people undergo queuing at Lunar house or going to the passport office and waiting for a response. I, too, deprecate the idea of removing our right to intervene and stop the removal of people who enter this country. Under these guidelines, anyone who enters the country, visa national or non-visa national, cannot have a Member of Parliament intervene on his behalf unless he can demonstrate exceptional and compelling circumstances. That is a matter of grave importance.

The Minister tells us that we can always contact the out-of-hours telephone number, which I have done several times. When I ring it, I do not speak to the Minister. I get a civil servant who then contacts another civil servant at the airport—and they make the decision.

I have tried to get in touch with the Minister about matters of importance during the summer recess and at times in the parliamentary Session when he is globe trotting in his other guise as the Minister with responsibility for broadcasting. When attempts have been made to contact him, he has not been able to give us a reply. In one particular case, the Minister had gone on holiday to an island in the Outer Hebrides and was not contactable. His private secretary informed me that there was no way in which I could contact the Minister but that they would send a helicopter to drop his box. Apparently, there was no one else on the island and there were no telephone communications with it. The Minister failed to read a document that was dropped in the box, so the person concerned spent an extra week in custody at Heathrow.

I do not intend to honour the guidelines telling us not to intervene in the cases of people who live in other constituencies but come to us because their Members are not sympathetic. I have given notice to the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) that I am raising this matter about him this evening. It concerns a case of a month ago and a person who lived in the constituency of the hon. Member for Northampton, North. This person went to see the hon. Gentleman to ask him to put a stop on the departure of another person. The hon. Gentleman refused, so this person went to my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook, who put a stop on the departure. The person then came to me, and I did, too.

The hon. Member for Northampton, North was so furious that he rang the Minister's private office and said that he refused to accept any other stops and that the person would have to leave the country. These guidelines mean that people who live in constituencies with unsympathetic Members become the prisoners of the prejudices of those Members. People should not be put in that position.

I am not prepared to accept the time limit of five days. It is utterly impossible to process representations within that time. If a stop is put on, for example, on a Sunday evening, I come to Parliament on a Monday and my first opportunity to see my constituent would be on the Friday of the week following the stop, by which time five working days would have been completed. These are complex matters; people may require the intervention of linguists who speak, for example, Punjabi or Gujurati. We must ensure that they get more advice——

Ms. Abbott: Does my hon. Friend agree that five working days are particularly problematic in the cases of people who seek asylum as refugees? I have often had to make inquiries abroad about people who are fleeing and five working days are not enough time in which to do that. The risk then is that people may be sent back to death or torture.

Mr. Vaz: I agree. These cases are complex and cannot be dealt with quickly—that is what the Minister tells us in his replies. He says that there must be investigations, meetings and interviews. That cannot be done in five days. I shall not honour this time limit; I shall stick to the original limit of 12 days and supply my representations in that time——

Mr. Madden: The Minister laid great emphasis on setting time limits within which hon. Members must make their representations. My hon. Friend has illustrated the long delays that our constituents suffer, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Lamond). Does my hon. Friend agree that it is now imperative that the Home Office sets time limits on its own considerations, and the Foreign Office does likewise?

We and our constituents are suffering from the unacceptable delays to which my hon. Friend has referred. Time limits are to be set on Members. Time limits on Ministers are long overdue.

Mr. Vaz: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Minister may find that the guidelines are challengeable in the courts and that they will result in the abrogation of his responsibility as the Minister responsible for immigration. In my view, it is open to people to challenge the guidelines on the ground that they fetter the Minister's discretion to intervene. Much could have been done to improve the service. The recruitment of more staff, the allocation of more resources and assurances that immigration officers would act quickly in dealing with cases would be more helpful than restricting the rights of hon. Members to intervene.

How many people did the Minister consult before he came to his decision about the guidelines? How many law centres, Members of Parliament and people associated with immigration matters did he consult? He came to Leicester recently and attended a luncheon given by Leicester Inner City Conservative Association. In a letter dated 24 August the association said:

"We are extremely fortunate to obtain the services of Mr. Timothy Renton, M.P.".

The association proposed to charge £8 per head for the luncheon, but nobody wanted to go to see the Minister and the association had to offer free meals.

The right of hon. Members to intervene in immigration cases is a lifeline to many of my constituents. Hundreds of thousands of people in this country and abroad look to their Members of Parliament to intervene in this way. I do not know whether the House realises it, but yesterday in all parts of Britain we celebrated the festival of Diwali, the festival of light. It is a very important Hindu festival, but many people could not take part in celebrating it because they are anxiously waiting for husbands, wives, children or other dependants who are locked into the bureaucracy of the Home Office and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Today the Government say that the time limit will be five days. Next week they will say it is to be 24 hours and then they will abolish it completely. I hope that hon. Members from all parties will join us in refusing to allow our rights to be abrogated in this way and will help us to ensure that this lifeline is retained for our constituents.

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone): I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in the debate, and I shall be brief because we look forward to hearing the Minister's reply.

I welcome the guidelines. It is essential that the Minister should have time to give proper consideration to exceptional cases, which require his discretion or which contain anomalies that need to be properly examined. He cannot be expected to do that if at the same time he is expected to give his individual and personal attention to routine inquiries.

If the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) carries out his stated intention of continuing to send anything and everything to the Minister, cases that require time, ministerial intervention and careful consideration will suffer. I do not understand why hon. Members handling immigration cases should think that they should be able to handle them in a way that is different from the handling of other cases. If a constituent comes to see me or telephones about a tax problem, I do not rush off to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor. If a constituent telephones about a social security problem, I do not go to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security. I go to my right hon. Friends only when I am fully satisfied that I cannot get the matter resolved expeditiously and satisfactorily at a different level. I expect to have to react in the same way to immigration cases.

Mr. Bernie Grant (Tottenham): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Miss Widdecombe: I am sorry, but there is not enough time.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook said that this was an authoritarian measure. I can imagine few things more authoritarian than an hon. Member being able to intervene arbitrarily in the procedures and course of justice and put on a stop, even though that hon. Member has very little information. It is right that hon. Members should take the responsibility that the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) felt they should not have to take. Hon. Members must satisfy themselves that they are intervening with just cause, and not merely for the sake of it and automatically. If the guidelines encourage a greater sense of responsibility on the part of hon. Members and greater efficiency and discrimination in the Minister's office, they will be most welcome. I support them.

6.45 pm

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): Conservative Members have asked why hon. Members should have more rights in immigration matters than in matters affecting taxation or whatever. I shall enlighten them. Immigration matters are nearly always matters of life and death and of extraordinary personal significance. We intervene on behalf of people who fear that if they are deported they will face death. We intervene on behalf of children and grandparents coming to visit their families, sometimes because of sickness or because a member of the family may be dying.

Immigration matters require greater powers of intervention by hon. Members because the personal issues involved are of such serious moment and, increasingly, because the decisions by immigration officers at ports of entry are arbitrary and unfair. In such cases we are the only recourse. Week in, week out, I have to deal with people who have been stopped at the airport because the immigration officer thinks that they are not coming here for a holiday. The immigration officer does not have to prove his case, and people are just sent back.

If Conservative Members did the work on immigration cases that my hon. Friends and I do they would understand the seriousness of the issue. The only substantive reason given by the Minister for altering the guidelines is that hon. Members are putting on too many stops. He said that there was too great a weight of correspondence. I and my hon. Friends argue that if the only problem is too great a weight of correspondence, why does the Minister not make more staff available to deal with the correspondence? It is no part of the job of a responsible Minister to curtail human rights on the basis that too many people are exercising those rights. It is wholly illiberal to curtail people's rights on the basis that too many are seeking to exercise them.

Many times in his speech the Minister said that the Government wished to provide a better service. The guidelines will not provide a better service; they will simply mean that many more people will be turned away at the ports. We would not have to exercise the right of stop so often and at such an increasing rate if it were not for the increasing number of apparently arbitrary decisions by immigration officers at the ports.

The Minister claims that he wants to provide a better service for our constituents and for people seeking to visit their families. If the Minister is anxious to improve the service and human rights, especially in the case of refugees who had their right of appeal curtailed in legislation presented earlier this year, then, even at this last minute, he should withdraw these rules which thoroughly interfere with the rights of hon. Members and provide the staff to answer our queries.

6.49 pm

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): I am grateful for the opportunity to participate briefly in this debate. I am also grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for the courtesy and speed with which his Department has handled difficult asylum cases involving citizens from Romania and the Communist bloc and north African workers in my constituency.

I wish to focus on one point that has arisen from the debate. We want people to come to this country from abroad and we are keen to encourage the tourist industry, but we must bear in mind that entry into this country is a privilege, not a right.

As Members of Parliament, we should consider our role in examining the cases of people who wish to come to this country and remember that we are not the final arbiters. We can merely plead one side of the case.

I have often received touching accounts of difficult situations, which I have put to Ministers, and argued cases in court, but that is not the whole of the matter. There is often another side to the case. It is for those people charged with the arbitration of those matters to decide such cases. This country has one of the fairest systems in the world. Nowhere else in the world is one allowed an appeal against a refusal of a visa and an appeal against a refusal of right of entry. We must consider our role in that light.

Members of Parliament can play an important role. I am glad to have played that role and been of help to some of my constituents who have found themselves in difficult circumstances because they have been refused entry to this country. However, if some of us refuse to co-operate with the system, it will break down to an even greater extent than has been suggested by the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz). It will create chaos and give some people a privilege. The Home Office's operations will come to a stop while a person's case is taken out of the file and submitted to my hon. Friend the Minister, who will then write a letter. The case will then go back in the file, but, in the meantime, progress on all other cases will be halted. Cases will not, therefore, be handled fairly.

Mr. Hattersley rose——

Mr. Hind: The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) will tell the House, "I do not care what the Government decide or what system is put forward. I have no intention of co-operating with it." I say shame on him. It is grossly unfair to constituents of both Conservative and Opposition Members.

Mr. Hattersley rose——

Mr. Hind: This is a fair system. I welcome it and hope that it will work. I am sure that we shall do everything to make it work, but I cannot say the same for Opposition Members.

6.53 pm

Mr. Sydney Bidwell (Ealing, Southall): I must, of necessity, be brief, but I wish to give one example of an inhuman attitude by an immigration officer in Delhi. The Foreign Office reconsidered the case—a chap who wanted to come to his brother's wedding—but said that he could not come because he had a farm 170 miles from Delhi and only a 16-year-old son to leave in charge of it and he did not know the name of the bride in Britain. That was given as sufficient reason to refuse him entry for a visit.

The appeal process is a farce because the purpose of the visit has long passed by the time the appeal is heard. We have heard a great deal about these matters from Conservative Members and even more from Opposition Members who are deeply involved. The right hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison), a former Minister who dealt with immigration matters, showed that all is not right. The immigration system is inhumane. It is subject to considerable delays and needs a thorough overhaul. Hon. Members are right to protest. Those who apply for entry to this country, whether black, brown or white, should be treated by hon. Members in the same way as they treat their constituents.

Mr. Renton: This has been a short but worthwhile debate. I am grateful to hon. Members for the sensible points that they have made regarding a matter that relates directly to hon. Members' conventions and privileges. I appreciate the realistic view that some hon. Members, particularly Conservative Members, have expressed about representations and what they can achieve, and I shall reflect upon all the comments that have been made. We shall shortly publish the guidelines in their final form, with a view to implementation on 3 January 1989, and we shall ensure that all hon. Members receive clear advance notice of that.

I wish particularly to thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison), who has great knowledge of this subject, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground) and my hon. Friend the Member for Warwick and Leamington (Sir D. Smith) for their support of the draft guidelines and for the messages that they asked me to pass on to my private office, which I shall certainly do.

I wish to deal with the point raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury about the UKIAS referral system for dealing with asylum applications in this country. I am pleased to be able to tell him that the revised system, which came into operation on 1 September, is running smoothly and in a good co-operative spirit. As he will know, we consulted carefully and at great length about this with both UKIAS and the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

There is no guarantee that any individual case will be referred to UKIAS, but it is expected that referral will be the norm. So far, only a handful of cases have been referred to me, as the Minister involved, where UKIAS and our immigration service have not been able to agree on the appropriate treatment of the refugee applicant. So far, that is working well. I hope that the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott), who raised that matter with me, will take comfort from that answer.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury raised the difficult question of receiving representations only from constituency Members. We should not have hard and fast rules about that.

Mr. Bernie Grant: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Renton: I cannot give way to the hon. Gentleman.

When my right hon. and learned Friend the Patronage Secretary introduced his guidelines, there were no hard and fast rules on the subject. If my right hon. Friend reads the new draft carefully, he will see that there are no hard and fast rules now, but it is a difficult matter. He will realise that a constituency Member finds it extremely irritating to discover that another Member has taken up a case involving one of his constituents in which he has declined to intervene because he did not think the case was good enough, after having looked into it and discussed it with the immigration service.

Mr. Grant: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Renton: No. I have told the hon. Gentleman that I will not give way.

The constituency Member finds that another hon. Member has taken up the case, is in touch with my private office and is requesting that the removal be deferred. We shall continue to operate tactfully and carefully in this matter.

The hon. Member for Oldham, Central and Royton (Mr. Lamond) raised a difficult point, which worries many people, about delays in immigration service interviews. Priority is given to entry clearance interviews, but some delays may occur during peak periods. With improved working procedures, we are trying to shorten those delays.

We heard nothing tonight from the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) about what he would do to improve immigration procedures. However, that is typical of his attitude to those problems —all words, all opposition and no constructive suggestions.

Meanwhile, we will continue to improve procedures at Lunar house and services to Members of Parliament. That is why I recommend the draft guidelines to the House.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of the draft revised guidelines for handling Members' representations in immigration cases.

Points of Order

7.13 pm

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There is, as you know, a convention that if hon. Members are to be referred to in a debate, they are told in advance that that will happen. I understand that I was referred to in the previous debate. I also understand that it was said that I had been told that I would be referred to. That is not the case.

I tried to find out what had been said about me and, from what I understand, it was basically total nonsense. My position is the same as that of any right hon. or hon. Member. If I am approached by a constituent, I will look into the matter carefully and take great pains to do what I should for him. As you are aware, the guidelines say that if there are new, exceptional and compelling circumstances——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. The hon. Gentleman cannot now seek to make the speech that he might have made had he been here for the previous debate. The House is aware of the point made by the hon. Gentleman. The Chair regrets any lapse in the normal courtesies of the House.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I informed the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) that I intended to mention him in the debate. I wrote the note myself and, because I was participating in the debate and could not leave the Chamber, the note was given to my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott) and she put the note in the hon. Gentleman's pigeon hole. If he does not clear his pigeon hole or look at his correspondence, I am not responsible.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House should not be discussing pigeon holes.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must have one point of order at a time. That matter has now been adequately explained.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Are you aware of the difficulties that right hon. and hon. Members have had in obtaining information about the allocation of time for the numerous outstanding amendments to the Housing Bill, which we are to debate tomorrow? The Clerk of the House and his colleagues were most helpful in dealing with inquiries. I have just been told that a copy of the allocation of time motion will be made available to me. Whether it was known that I would be raising a point of order, I cannot say. Is it not a serious inconvenience to right hon. and hon. Members, and a discourtesy to the House, that the motion on the allocation of time was not made available earlier? Is there anything that you can do to assist us?

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I and people in my office have been making inquiries about that matter during the day in order to find out about the Government motion, which may now have been laid in the Table Office. As the Leader of the House is present, it would be helpful if he could tell us whether the Government motion has now been laid in the Table Office, or, if not, when that is likely to happen. As the debate is occurring on a Friday, the allocation of our own time needs to be planned in advance. A statement would be helpful.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The motion has either been tabled or will shortly be tabled. If hon. Members want to know the terms of it within the next few minutes, they can obtain the information from my office.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am only trying to be helpful to the Chair. I do not often raise points of order, but the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) causes trouble in the Chamber by shouting and yawping from his seat and often has to be pulled up by the Chair. There are times when I mention him and do not inform him, because he breaks the rules of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If that is helpfulness from the hon. Gentleman, I shudder to think what I will hear when he is not being helpful.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): Further to the brief statement made by the Leader of the House, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Hon. Members who served on the Housing Bill Committee are wondering how we will deal with the 240 Lords amendments that remain to be dealt with tomorrow. I press the Leader of the House to make a firmer statement to the House on what the timetable will be, or to make it available immediately.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think that the Leader of the House can do that. He was responding to a point of order, which has now been met. The hon. Gentleman is asking the Leader of the House to make a statement, for which there is no provision.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I made it clear that it was not a point of order.

Mr. McCartney: I do not agree with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Many hon. Members disagree with the Chair, but the Chair must make the rulings and decisions.

Northampton Bill [Lords]

Order for Third Reading read.

7.20 pm

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill is promoted by Northampton borough council and has the unanimous support of the Conservative party, the Labour party and the Social and Liberal Democratic party. It covers a number of miscellaneous matters of local interest. One of the main parts of the Bill responds to public demand in Northampton to continue for a period rights of burial in a cemetery where loved ones have booked a place. Those rights are about to expire. Unless the Bill is passed, many bereaved families will be unable to bury their loved ones properly.

The Bill rationalises certain local charities and modernises the law relating to local freemen. It also repeals certain spent enactments. The Bill has completed its passage through the House of Lords and has completed all its stages here, except Third Reading. No objection was taken to it during previous stages, and the Bill went to an unopposed Bills Committee. The promoters respectfully submit that the Bill should be given its Third Reading.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): My name appears on a blocking motion to the Bill, so perhaps I should say a few words about it.

I and several of my hon. Friends have been blocking private business for the past few days to draw attention once again to the need to reform the private business procedure. A Joint Select Committee reported on the private business procedure and made some sensible proposals. It is important that the House should be given an early opportunity to discuss that report. We hope that the Government will provide an early opportunity to amend the Standing Orders for private business. My intention in tabling the blocking motion is to persuade the Government that we should have a debate on this subject at an early stage.

Having tabled the blocking motion, I received a letter about the Bill which illustrated the need to reform the private business procedure. I suspect that, with the exception of the hon. Members for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) and Northampton, South (Mr. Morris), the majority of hon. Members know little about the detailed circumstances of Northampton. Therefore, we are not best placed to pass legislation dealing with Northampton. Local provision should be made in Northampton, without recourse to a Bill in the House. The private Bill procedure does not allow the people of Northampton to influence this legislation. Matters are quickly taken out of their hands and put into those of hon. Members.

I had assumed that the Bill was not opposed, because it went into an unopposed Committee. I had assumed that it was a measure that everyone in Northampton wanted. However, I received a letter from the secretary of the Kingsthorpe Grove Allotment Association, D. F. Randall, who said that the Bill was advertised last year for presentation to Parliament in the 1987-88 Session and, as is required under the private Bill legislation, a notice appeared in the Chronicle and Echo in Northampton on 10 December. It stated that any local people who objected to the Bill should make representations about it. He said that objections had to be made over Christmas, which was not convenient for many people. It was felt that local residents did not have a good opportunity to make representations about the Bill before it came to Parliament.

The writer says that the association had contacted the chief executive of Northampton council asking for explanations about clauses of the Bill, but did not receive a satisfactory reply, which is deplorable. I have no way of checking whether that is accurate, but the writer says that, despite requests for information, the chief executive was unwilling to meet the association to discuss the matter.

The association has experienced considerable difficulty in discovering what is contained in the statutes that are to be repealed. I am not in a position to judge whether the secretary of the association or the chief executive is right in these matters, but I should like an assurance from the hon. Member for Northampton, South that the repeal of 11 local Acts will not lead to a loss of local footpaths or rights in the area. That is the burden of the letter from the secretary of the association and from two other people in Northampton.

Those local Acts go back to the fourth Bill of the reign of Henry VII and An Act for the Convent of Saint Andrew in Northampton. Most of them conferred a right of way and access to commons in Northampton. It has been suggested to me that by passing this legislation those rights and footpaths will be removed. If I am wrong, I shall happily give way to the hon. Member for Northampton, South and accept his assurance and that of the promoters that not one footpath will be lost.

Mr. Michael Morris: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman has received such a letter, because the interested parties made representations to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), myself and the chief executive, and meetings were held to consider the Bill. I have corresponded with the chief executive, following at least two requests from my constituents. I cannot give the assurance that the hon. Gentleman wants, first, because it is not in my constituency and, secondly, because although he has had time to raise this point with me he has not done so. If he had done so this afternoon, I could have made a telephone call. If he had given me notice, I should have been delighted to give him the assurance that he wants. All the people of Northampton, the elected representatives of the Labour party, the Conservative party and the minority parties take footpath rights extremely seriously, and I cannot believe that any action would be taken that would undermine those rights.

Mr. Bennett: I am disappointed that the hon. Gentleman cannot give me the assurance I want. While I continue my speech, perhaps he will have a word with the agents of the promoters to see whether they can give that assurance. As I understand it, they are normally in a position to brief hon. Members who are sponsoring a Bill. I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman accepted responsibility for sponsoring the Bill without understanding what it would do. That illustrates my original point. If the hon. Gentleman introducing the Bill does not understand it sufficiently to be able to give assurances about footpaths, we are in a difficult position.

Mr. Michael Morris: The hon. Gentleman seeks to bowl a fast ball at 7.29 pm with a letter that I have not seen, but which is presumably genuine. He had plenty of time to tell me about it earlier. The main emphasis of the Bill is on a cemetery. The other elements are subsidiary matters flowing from a perfectly normal tidying-up process. I accept that the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) has a deep and genuine interest in the Ramblers Association, and it is perfectly justifiable for him to pursue that interest in the House. Nevertheless, it would have been courteous to warn me that he would seek reassurance on that matter. I shall, however, do my best to double-check the situation in the next few moments.

Mr. Bennett: I apologise if I did not give the hon. Gentleman sufficient notice. I assumed that he would be able to answer questions of that kind. That is precisely the problem with private business. I objected to the Bill, not because I had taken the trouble to consider its merits, but as a means of pressing for time to debate the private business procedure, which I regard as entirely unsatisfactory.

Having put down the blocking motion last week, I received a phone call on Monday from an individual asking me to raise certain objections to the Bill. I explained that I could not deal with the matter on the telephone, but that if I received a written submission I would consider it. The documents arrived in this morning's post. Had I not been on a Statutory Instruments Committee, I might have had time to pursue the matter this morning. The hon. Member for Northampton, South will appreciate that Members of Parliament have many responsibilities.

I have a feeling that people come to me about matters relating to private business because I understand the procedure, so I tend to get dragged into situations of this kind. All that I am doing today is suggesting to the House that it is high time we reformed the procedure so that we do not end up with debates of this kind in which I have to raise questions about footpaths in Northampton, when I have very little time in which to consider the Bill.

Mr. Michael Morris: Such is the speed of modern communications that I can now give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he seeks.

Mr. Bennett: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the assurance that now there will be no blocking of footpaths or of access to commons.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I simply wish to reinforce the point made by my hon. Friend for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris), that the most important aspect of the Bill, and the reason why it is being presented, is to allow certain burials to take place in the graveyard in future. It is probable that such burials would need to go ahead at the rate of about one per month, so if the Bill is delayed many people who have lost their loved ones will be deprived of the right to bury them according to their wishes. I am sure that the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), as a caring and compassionate Member of the House, will take that into account and do what he can to facilitate the progress of the Bill now that he has received the undertaking that he sought.

Mr. Bennett: I appreciate that point. It illustrates the faults in the private legislation procedure. Had Northampton council produced legislation simply to deal with cemeteries, I should not have received a letter requiring me to seek assurances about footpaths. In fact, someone in the council offices pointed out that a local Bill of this kind cannot be promoted very often because of the pressures on parliamentary time and the pressures of promoting such a Bill, and a whole host of other little bits are then put into the Bill, making it far more complicated for local people to consider. That is where the procedure starts to go wrong. We end up with a Bill, the primary purpose of which is to ensure that a cemetery remains open and burials can continue to take place—I appreciate all the reasons for that—but which has all kinds of other pieces of legislation tacked on to it.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): An assurance has been given, but how do we know that it will come into effect if it is not in the Bill? Perhaps my hon. Friend can reassure me, as I am somewhat sceptical.

Mr. Bennett: It is the custom of the House, and one that has been reinforced over the years by promoters of private legislation, that any assurance given in the House by the Member dealing with a Bill on behalf of its promoters is always honoured.

Mr. Michael Morris indicated assent.

Mr. Bennett: The assurance about footpaths and commons is thus as good as one written into the Bill and I do not query it. I merely stress that this is not the right way to proceed in legislating either for the cemeteries in Northampton or for the footpaths there. The best people to make those decisions are the people of Northampton, who have the necessary detailed knowledge.

As I shall make clear on one of the carry-over motions, it is extremely important that the new procedures recommended for private business should be introduced at the earliest possible moment. We should then not need to have what I regard as a series of thoroughly unsatisfactory debates. Looking around the Chamber, I see several hon. Members who were here on Tuesday night. I cannot believe that many of them found that debate satisfactory. Having obtained the necessary assurances about the Bill before us, I merely seek to impress upon the House the need to reform the procedures for private business as soon as possible.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I was not here on Tuesday night when two other Bills and carry-over motions were debated, so I come new to the subject, but I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) that it is unsatisfactory to have a debate on what is simply a carry-over motion.

Mr. Michael Morris rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps I can put the hon. Gentleman right. This is not a carry-over motion. It is a Third Reading.

Dr. Marek: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. The others were carry-over motions, but this is a Third Reading, so it may be better if I keep my comments on carry-over motions for the next debate.

It is extremely difficult for hon. Members to know exactly what is going on with all the various private Bills. I find no difficulty in coming new to this Bill and listening to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish, who expressed genuine concern about the possible blocking of footpaths and access to commons. I was glad to hear the hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) give what I understood to be a categorical guarantee that nothing of the kind would happen, but that should have been made clear in the Bill much earlier. If there is any fault in the procedure for private Bills on Third Reading, it is perhaps that insufficient time has been left for my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish to allay the worries of ramblers and others about access to footpaths. Matters of that kind should have been made clear well before Third Reading. We could then stick to the real purpose of the Third Reading debate—whether to take the Bill and like it, with all the various powers that it includes, or not to like it and not to take it. [Interruption.] Does the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) wish to intervene?

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): No. I will follow the hon. Gentleman.

Dr. Marek: The other problem with the private Bill procedure is that it tends not to be honest. I will explain what I mean by that. People tend to make speeches for reasons connected not so much with the Bill before the House as with others that may follow. I do not suggest that any such thing is happening today, but that it a perfectly honest procedure with a clear purpose and one that has doubtless been used in the House for many years. I am not sure whether my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish can give me an immediate answer, as he has already spoken once and would need the leave of the House to speak again, but can he encapsulate in two or three sentences why he thinks that the private Bill procedure is unsatisfactory?

If a Bill commands general support, by and large the Bill is passed. Sometimes people want to delay a Bill because they want to block debate on a later Bill. However, I do not believe that any Bill that should be passed has not been passed reasonably quickly. If such a Bill has been delayed, it has been only for a few days or weeks at most. However, some Bills do not receive the general support of the House. It might be that a particular group feels that there is something nasty about the Bill and they do not want it to be passed. If such an opinion is represented by only a small group, that group does not have its way. However, it has a little power because it can delay the Bill for more than a few days or a few weeks.

My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish has probably tabled more blocking motions than any other Member. He knows more about such tactics than the rest of us put together. However, at the end of the day hon. Members cannot stop a Bill unless a majority vote for that. They simply have the power to delay it. Because the promoters wish the Bills to be dealt with speedily, they tend to see sense. Opposition concentrates their minds. That is a positive aspect of the procedure on private Bills. If I had a well-founded objection to a Bill, and I shouted "Object" to block the Bill, the promoters and their colleagues would soon ask me why I objected and whether there was any way in which they could overcome my objection. Such a practice is not followed by the Government—certainly not a Government with such a large majority. They do not take any notice of anybody.

If the promoters of a Bill believe that an hon. Member has serious worries about it, they will try to discover the reasons. If they feel that an hon. Member is merely deploying certain tactics to block another Bill, they will put up with that, provided that their Bill is passed at the end of the day. If an hon. Member seriously feels that there is something wrong with the Bill, the promoters will ask whether they can help to alleviate the concerns and attempt to discover whether there is any common meeting ground between the parties. It is good that we are having a short debate on this Bill. Already the promoter has given a categorical assurance that no footpaths will be blocked and ramblers can continue to use them.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: My hon. Friend asked whether, in a few words, I could explain what was wrong with the private Bill procedure. I cannot. The Joint Committee on Private Business has published a report, and anyone who reads it will see the recommendations for reform of the procedure. When we reach the carry-over motion for the next Bill, I shall say more about that and illustrate why the report argues that we should not regularly give permission for Bills to be carried over. I do not wish to say anything more about the Bill now before us.

Dr. Marek: I, too, will not say a great deal more. We occasionally have to deal with carry-over motions and I shall refer further to those in our later debates. There appears to be general assent for Third Reading of this Bill. I await with interest to hear whether the sponsor and other hon. Members think we should give it a Third Reading.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I shall be brief. I have visited Northampton on several occasions, but I do not intend specifically to comment on the details of the Bill, although I welcome the concessions made by the hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris).

The wider issue of how we deal with private Bills will come before us later, but I think it appropriate at this time to make one or two comments. We are in the last days of this Session of Parliament, and I feel it appropriate to say that this House sits longer, by the hour, than any other legislature in the world. We are miles ahead, and the other place is second only to us. One reason that we sit for so long is that we must deal with a great deal of business that, quite honestly, would be better dealt with elsewhere. Because we do not have a devolved system of legislation, as do many other countries, it cannot be dealt with elsewhere. Because there is no forum for debate in Scotland, Wales the regions and the counties, it must be dealt with here. I am sure that a more informed debate would take place if a Bill such as this, dealing exclusively with Northampton matters—or, indeed, any of the others listed for debate tonight—were debated in places other than the House.

Of course, if we were debating the Channel tunnel—the Bill was hybrid, being part private and part public—the House would be the proper forum because the matter would be of national importance. However, in general, private legislation is specific to the area in question, as are the Bills before us tonight.

I admit that I have not read the report in detail, although I understand its general tenor. I hope that we will soon consider the inter-relationship of our procedures, which certainly need reforming, with the constitutional structures within which we force ourselves to debate matters that would more appropriately be debated elsewhere. We should consider what to do about our constitution so that we do not have to deal with matters that would be better dealt with in the nations and regions of the United Kingdom.

Whatever we do, and for as long as we have a procedure that ensures that legislation goes through this and another place, there should be a proper way in which representatives—either through interest or as constituency Members—of those affected by the Bill can make their views felt and, if necessary, delay specific legislation so that their concerns may be partially met. The opportunity for a Bill to be challenged by local representatives of the area affected is appropriate for debate, whatever the Bill. Whatever new procedures might be devised in the new Session of Parliament, I hope that that aspect will be retained.

7.48 pm

Mr. Michael Morris: I am grateful to hon. Members for their contributions, especially the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) who demonstrated his understanding of the predicament in which we found ourselves by the questions that he raised. I hope that the assurances that I gave fully met his wishes.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed, with amendments.

Port of Tyne Bill [Lords]

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That the Promoters of the Port of Tyne Bill [Lords] shall have leave to suspend proceedings thereon in order to proceed with the Bill, if they think fit, in the next Session of Parliament, provided that the Agents for the Bill give notice to the Clerks in the Private Bill Office of their intention to suspend further proceedings not later than the day before the close of the present Session and that all Fees due on the Bill up to that date be paid;

That if the Bill is brought from the Lords in the next Session, the Agents for the Bill shall deposit in the Private Bill Office a declaration signed by them, stating that the Bill is the same, in every respect, as the Bill which was brought from the Lords in the present Session;

That as soon as a certificate by one of the Clerks in the Private Bill Office, that such a declaration has been so deposited, has been laid upon the Table of the House, the Bill shall be deemed to have been read the first and shall be ordered to be read a second time;

That the Petition against the Bill presented in the present Session which stands referred to the Committee on the Bill shall stand referred to the Committee on the Bill in the next Session;

That no Petitioners shall be heard before the Committee on the Bill, unless their Petition has been presented within the time limited within the present Session or deposited pursuant to paragraph (b) of Standing Order 126 relating to Private Business;

That, in relation to the Bill, Standing Order 127 relating to Private Business shall have effect as if the words "under Standing Order 126 (Reference to committee of petitions against Bill)" were omitted;

That no further Fees shall be charged in respect of any proceedings on the Bill in respect of which Fees have already been incurred during the present Session;

That these Orders be Standing Orders of the House.—[The Chairman of Ways and Means.]

7.59 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I should like to speak briefly and suggest that we should consider carefully whether to consent to the carry-over motion. We should consider this issue carefully because the Select Committee on Procedure stated that it did not feel that carry-over motions were a satisfactory device and that if we are to continue to have private legislation, in normal circumstances attempts should be made to ensure that the private legislation completes its passage through the House in one Session or in two at the most. As the House knows, we have just had a longer than normal Session, so there should have been more opportunity for the promoters to get their legislation through than would be the case in a normal Session.

It is a good parliamentary rule that public business has to be completed in one Session and that if it is not completed in one Session it must start all over again. That means that we can proceed with business in an orderly way. If certain business is not completed by the end of the Session, it is cleared away and people will have second thoughts.

However, that procedure does not apply with private business. The argument is that the promoters will have gone to considerable expense. In some cases, the petitioners also will have gone to considerable expense in, for example, briefing counsel and possibly in appearing before the Committee. It would be unfair if at that stage the Bill were then thrown out because of lack of time and a new Bill had to be introduced.

I am sure that anyone who has read the report on private business will agree that there is clear evidence that a lot of legislation has gone through the House under the guise of private business, although it could have been dealt with in other ways. It is high time that the House adopted the recommendations in the report and made it clear that it does not see private business as a cheap way of getting round our planning legislation or as a cheap way of promoting something that the promoters consider desirable or as a way in which local arguments can be sidelined with people who do not know the local details making the decisions. At the moment the procedure is a farce in that any hon. Member who serves on a private Bill Committee must have no knowledge of what is going on, yet that person has to sit in an almost quasi-judicial capacity.

Therefore, the House should consider carry-over motions carefully. I hope that my hon. Friends will make it clear that, if this carry-over motion is carried, they will not expect any more carry-over motions for the Port of Tyne Bill [Lords]; they will expect the legislation to be completed within the next few months. Indeed, by this time next year we expect private business to be so reformed that carry-over motions will be brought before the House only rarely, if at all.

I want undertakings from the Government that they will facilitate the opportunity for a debate on the report and that they will bring forward amendments to the Standing Orders so that we can introduce a new procedure at an early stage. I am disappointed that the Leader of the House is not in his place because I had hoped that he would give that undertaking. I raised this matter with him at business questions today and he said that he thought that he would be able to find time for an early debate before the Government had produced their response to the Select Committee. However, he did not give any further undertakings about how soon the debate would take place. I understand that there are rumours that it might be in January or in early February.

I am not sure whether the Chairman of Ways and Means is in a position to intervene in the debate and to give us some sign of how he, as Chairman of Ways and Means, feels about whether the new procedure will be debated and introduced. I am well aware that he has taken a great deal of interest in the setting up of the special Committee to investigate procedures. Indeed, he gave evidence to the Committee. I am also well aware that you, Mr. Speaker, have in the past taken a great deal of interest in private business and that you are aware of many of its problems.

I hope that there will be an early opportunity for a debate. I should have preferred the Government to give us that assurance, because I put it to the Whips that if such a Government assurance had been forthcoming, I should not have had to press very much more tonight in regard to the other carry-over motions and the Government might be able to get back to their business at an early stage. However, it does not look as though anyone will offer me those assurances.

Although the Government have had time to consider the private Bill procedure, one is left with the slight suspicion that they still have an enthusiasm for private business because they sometimes seem almost to resort to it. The county council "jumbo" Bills are an example of the Government seeming to implement their legislation through private business. I am sure that anyone who listened to the debates on Tuesday night would have been left with the suspicion, especially if they looked at the voting figures, that those two Bills relating to the import of coal were being promoted with clear Government support. Those Bills should not have been considered as private legislation. They should have been dealt with through planning applications in the locality and if it was necessary, for the country, to take a policy decision to import coal, that should be done through public rather than private legislation.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): The hon. Gentleman knows far more about procedure generally than I do. My question relates exactly to the matter that he has raised.

Has it traditionally been the policy and the procedure of the House that the Government should take a Government line on private Bill matters when there is an alternative way of dealing with the issue by normal resolution at county or other level? I remind the hon. Gentleman of the example of the Hampshire (Lyndhurst) Bypass Bill which interfered with the legislation on the New Forest. That issue could have been dealt with by amendment of statute, but a private Bill was enacted. Although it has since died, the Government intervened to ensure that the Bill was given a Second Reading with Government votes. That Bill was very much a breach of the policy of protecting the New Forest. We have seen other examples. As a matter of history, is there a pattern to suggest that the Government should not intervene in that way and seek to impose their policies?

Mr. Speaker: Before the hon. Gentleman is tempted to go too far down that line, we must concentrate on the reason why this particular Bill should or should not be subject to a carry-over motion and not other Bills.

Mr. Bennett: I appreciate that point, Mr. Speaker. The Port of Tyne Bill illustrates the problem of private legislation because in so far as the port is being extended as a result of legislation that should be covered by local planning procedures. However, as far as certain harbour works and alterations to the coastline are concerned, such as the placing of buoys, such matters have traditionally been dealt with by private legislation. I am not convinced that it is necessary to use private legislation for such matters. The planning aspects should be done through planning procedures and it would be perfectly reasonable to have special orders to deal with the harbour works. That is investigated in the report on the reform of private business procedure.

For most of last century and before, the House spent a great deal of time on private legislation, but since the introduction of local government planning legislation in 1947 the need for private business seems greatly diminished. Now it is almost a historic carry over. Last century there was a great deal of wheeling and dealing on private legislation. A Bill was introduced for a railway from London to Birmingham and a bribe had to be offered to the people of Northampton that the railway would not go through Northampton so that the then Member for Northampton would not cause a fuss in Parliament and stop the legislation. The people of Northampton wanted to keep the railway as far from the town as possible and certain noble interests wanted to keep the railway off their land. On the other hand, certain private landowners managed to get their own private railway station through private business. But throughout that wheeling and dealing the Government were supposed, at least officially, to remain neutral. In private business the Government did not whip or organise.

I have been in the House since 1974 and the firm tradition has been that private business was the business of Members, and not a matter on which the Government or Opposition issued Whips, although there were occasions when individual Members issued Whips. In answer to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), it is only recently that the Government have adopted an attitude on private Bills. The best example of whipping on private business is the Felixstowe Dock and Railway Bill, and we saw the same process on some coal measures. The Government have an opportunity to express their view in Committee and it is then that they should do so.

It is high time that we got round to introducing this legislation. I am disappointed that tonight the Government cannot assure us that they will get on with the reform of private business and that carry-over motions will be a thing of the past. We have before us a whole series of carry-over motions, and I appeal to the Government Front Bench to have a word with the Leader of the House and suggest that the sooner he gives assurances that we shall have an early opportunity to debate the report on private procedure, the less need there will be for my hon. Friends and me to chivvy the Government and complain about this procedure.

I hope that tonight we can at last give an indication to the promoters and the Government that we are not satisfied with carry-over motions, and issue a warning to anyone thinking about presenting private business next Session that we shall expect them to complete it in one Session, and not to plan for a carry-over motion. If the matter is non-controversial, why has it taken nine months to get the Bill so far? If, on the other hand, it is controversial, should we be dealing with it? We should not.

I hope that at an early stage the Government will give us better assurances that these procedures will be reformed.

8.14 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): The Bill has passed unopposed through the House of Lords. It redefines in up-to-date terms the duties and powers of the authority. It provides for the authority to issue general directions for ensuring the safety of vessels and persons using the dock, and it enables the harbour master to give special directions to particular vessels where necessary. The Bill contains provisions which enable the authority to regulate the placing and other related matters of lights which might interfere with the safe navigation of the channels by vessels. It seeks to increase the safety of those who use dock roads by enabling certain provisions of the general road traffic legislation to apply to those roads. It also effects an uprating of certain penalties and modernises the procedure for confirming port bye-laws. It empowers the authority to bring about the development of land within the port which is no longer needed for port purposes.

The House will know that I have no direct connection with the River Tyne. My constituency is on the Tees. I have been asked to make it clear that the two blocking motions tabled by my hon. Friends the Member for Yarrow (Mr. Dixon) and for South Shields (Dr. Clark) were intended to enable my hon. Friends to speak with the promoters and have certain questions answered. I do not need to explain to you, Mr. Speaker, how one can get caught up with business in this House. I am having to make this statement on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Yarrow because he is the Opposition Deputy Chief Whip and his presence is required elsewhere. That is why he has to put up with a second-rate right-handed lieutenant.

I make this statement so that the House understands that my two hon. Friends who wish to block the Bill are happy to agree with the carry-over motion so that in some weeks' time they can clear up matters with the promoters. To seek to block a carry-over motion now would be grotesquely unfair on those who did not expect the Standing Orders of the House to be changed so suddenly.

Question put and agreed to.

8.18 pm

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I do not intend to speak at any length on this motion. I tried to persuade the Government to assure us of an early debate on the report of the Select Committee on Procedure. I extended my sympathy to you, Mr. Speaker, as you have many years' experience of the problems of private legislation, and hoped that perhaps the Chairman of Ways and Means would catch your eye and intervene to show that he felt strongly that we must have an early debate on the reform of private business procedure. I should be grateful for an opportunity to hear him place those views on the record.

8.20 pm

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): It is only for convenience that I choose this location from which to address you, Mr. Speaker, and the House, and not because of any kind of partiality. I listened carefully to what the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) said in the earlier debate. I understand, and largely share, his concern that we should now ensure that the labours of the Joint Committee bear fruit, but we must ensure that we do that properly.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): I wonder whether the Chairman of Ways and Means agrees that planning matters are far better dealt with by the relevant local authorities or, if they are of major importance, that a public inquiry should take place. That would be a far better system than messing about, taking an unholy number of hours and putting Mr. Speaker in an invidious position. It would be far better for the House to ensure that all planning requirements are dealt with by local authorities.

The Chairman of Ways and Means: You would reproach me, Mr. Speaker, if, in replying, I were to turn the debate on the motion into a debate on procedure. I suggest to the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond) that he reads the report and my submission to the Committee. In my submission, I touched on the point that he has raised. I assure the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish and other hon. Members that there is a widespread concern that we should ensure that we respond to the recommendations in the report. We must respond to them having taken account of the local authority associations, Government Departments, agents and others who are directly affected. We must proceed in a thorough way. It makes sense to get those views.

I have said already to the Leader of the House, who has a sympathetic ear, that there should be a motion to take note of the Committee's report when hon. Members could put forward their views. Subsequently, recommendations could be put to the House.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I know that the Chairman of Ways and Means has followed these matters carefully and has been involved in helping to draw up the report, which will change the procedure and prevent backlogs such as this.

I wonder whether the Chairman will consider the following case, which may occur this year or next. Let us suppose that a carry-over motion is put forward this time next year on behalf of the promoters of the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill and the North Killingholme Cargo Terminal Bill. Let us suppose also that we manage to hold up those Bills for another 12 months, so that they fall within the new system. Would they have to start from afresh, rather than be carried over? There will always be Bills in the pipeline, whenever the new procedure is introduced. What will happen to those Bills when the new procedure is evolved? Will they wait continually? Each year there will be Bills waiting for carry-over motions. Unless the House accepts the argument for stopping a Bill in its tracks, the new procedure will never be implemented.

The Chairman of Ways and Means: I doubted the wisdom of being lured into taking part in the debate. I begin to feel that my reservations were right.

The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) will not expect me to comment on Bills that are not before the House tonight. I do not want to mislead him about the speed with which the recommendations made by the Joint Committee can be implemented. Some will require legislation and that, plainly, will take time. When he said that any changes that are made will impinge on some Bills that may be before the House, he was in the realm of hypothesis and it would be unwise to speculate on a particular situation.

We have been given the chance to listen to the views of hon. Members on this important matter, and I am pleased that there is so much interest in it. I am determined that the Joint Committee, having worked so hard and for so long, will see its labours bear fruit. We must not allow the report to gather dust, and I know that the Leader of the House shares that view. I hope that at some time we will debate the views of the House more fully.

If you will forgive me for having intervened, Mr. Speaker, I hope that I have helped us to make progress.

Mr. Speaker: I agreed to that intervention by the Chairman of Ways and Means because I thought that it might help the hon. Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett), who is seeking a debate on the Joint Committee's report. I entirely share his view and I listened to what the Leader of the House had to say. He said this afternoon that there would be a debate early in the new Session. Let us now return to the subject of the motion.

8.27 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I am not sure whether the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) were an objection to the Bill, or to the procedure. I ask that the Bill be carried over. The terms of the debate are strictly limited, so I cannot say—as I should—that the Bill will be an aid to jobs in Grimsby, which would otherwise be threatened, or that proper means for the disposal of effluent is essential and will improve the environment. Since negotiations between Tioxide and Associated British Ports have now been concluded but not ratified, the Bill should be carried over in case there is a breakdown in negotiations.

Mr. Redmond: Can my hon. Friend tell me whether the Bill will lead to an improvement in the environment, or will it simply mean that toxic waste will be moved from one place to another? Will there be an improvement in the environment?

Mr. Mitchell: I am satisfied that there will be. The Bill seeks to be an improvement on the River Humber (Burcom Outfall) Act 1986, which gave Tioxide powers to construct an outfall into the Humber to enable waste to be discharged into deeper water, where it could be more readily dispersed. That is a considerable environmental improvement and Tioxide must have an efficient means of waste disposal to safeguard jobs in the factory, which is in Grimsby.

Under the 1986 Act there had to be an agreement to protect the interests of Associated British Ports, as the conservancy authority. That agreement was not reached in time, so the Bill is an attempt to improve the position in those negotiations. It will probably be unnecessary, because agreement has been reached, although it has not been finalised. I hope that we can safeguard the Bill by allowing it to be carried over to the next Session, just in case any breakdown occurs. We should not throw away the work that has gone into the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

8.29 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): I hope that the House will allow the Bill to carry over into the next Session. The Bill, as modified, has the support of hon. Members who represent constituencies in the city of Newcastle upon Tyne. It also has the undivided support of the freemen's association which owns the leasehold on the Town moor in the city of Newcastle.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Did my hon. Friend say freemen or "freemasons"?

Mr. Brown: It is important to get that right. I assure my hon. Friend that I said "freemen," not "freemasons", although it would not be unusual if they had something to do with it. As far as I can tell, they are not specifically interested in the matter. Of course, as my hon. Friend would be the first to point out, one cannot always tell whether they are involved. However, that is irrelevant to the matter in hand.

Newcastle upon Tyne city council has unanimously agreed to promote the Bill, which is supported by the Labour majority, the Conservative minority and the much larger Liberal minority on the council. Incidentally, the Liberal representation on the city council is now twice the size of the Conservative representation, which shows how things are going in the north of England.

The Bill has been delayed, and it has been delayed for a good reason. It was being blocked by my hon. Friends the Members for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland), for Newcastle upon Tyne, North (Mr. Henderson), for South Shields (Dr. Clark) and myself. I take careful note of the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) about the reasonableness or otherwise of carrying a Bill over from one Session to the next, but with this Bill we have a good reason. My hon. Friends and I, who have the honour and privilege to represent communities on Tyneside, objected to the Bill because we did not believe that it contained sufficient safeguards to protect two principles which we believed to be encapsulated in existing legislation and which were highly desirable for our communities.

First, we thought that the Bill ought to protect the right of public access to the town moor—not just for the freemen of Newcastle but for all the citizens of Newcastle and for all those who come to visit the city. That has hitherto been the practice, although it has not been the law. We understand that such free access was intended in previous Acts, although it was not specifically stated.

We had a second objection. The Bill consolidates all previous legislation relating to our town moor which goes back 300 years and comprises a number of different Acts of Parliament. We suspected that it might enable the leader of the city council—the city council owns the freehold, although the freemen hold the lease in perpetuity—to bring pressure to bear on the freemen's association, which is not well funded, to sell part of the town moor for a car park or for a property development. The citizens of Newcastle feel very strongly that the town moor should be there for them to enjoy and that it should not be sold to property speculators. To prevent the leader of the council or anyone else from selling the town moor to property speculators we blocked the Bill and opened negotiations with the freemen, who wished to ensure its passage through the House.

Those negotiations have been entirely successful and we have inserted clauses that wholly protect the public right of access and prevent—as solidly as anything could—the alienation of the moor from the people of Newcastle. Because we argued and fought to secure those concessions, it was reasonable to delay the Bill, and it is now reasonable to carry it over into the next Session.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I congratulate my hon. Friend on getting such a good deal out of the promoters. However, that is no reason why Bills should be carried over in future. If the promoters know that it is difficult to obtain a carry-over, their minds will be concentrated and they will negotiate before the Bill reaches Parliament or early in its parliamentary proceedings. Because carry-over motions are now so commonplace, there is a temptation for everyone concerned in the negotiations to spin out the proceedings. I hope that in future promoters will come to the negotiating table much more quickly.

Mr. Brown: I wholeheartedly agree with my hon. Friend. If our perfectly justifiable requests to safeguard the moor from property developers and to safeguard public right of access to it had not been conceded, we should have held the Bill up indefinitely.

Mr. Skinner: My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) has made a very good point and we are right to thank him for it. I agree that he is right to hold out for safeguards and protections, but there is an additional point to be made. Not only do the promoters know that Bills can be carried over—especially under the Tory Government, for whom carry-over motions are becoming the order of the day—but they can milk the ratepayers of Newcastle and elsewhere. In the knowledge that they can get a carry-over motion at will, the promoters can say, "Let us carry over the Bill for a year, or even two, and all the time we can put in bills for big fat fees." The people of Newcastle will have to foot the bill. A carry-over motion will benefit the promoters, their agents, the lawyers and all the rest who can make a fat killing by carrying-over a Bill. They might have dragged my hon. Friend to the point at which he gave way—in this case he refused—and they would have lined their pockets as a result.

Mr. Brown: I have great sympathy with that intervention. I greatly resent the amount of public money that is spent on lawyers—unnecessarily in my view. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) touched on an apposite point. At one stage in our negotiations the city council was using its power of funding as a weapon in its negotiations with the freemen of the city. In my view, that was wrong. In all our dealings with the freemen of the city of Newcastle, they have behaved perfectly properly and, like us, have sought to protect the town moor in its existing form and prevent the encroachment of property developers. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover rightly hinted that others involved in public life would not have been unhappy for the Bill to have been passed in its earlier form, conceivably their enabling the alienation of open lands in Newcastle to property developers. I stand strongly against that, as do my hon. Friends who represent the city.

My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish referred to the abuse in the House of private business in an attempt to get round planning constraints. I wholeheartedly agree with him, although this Bill does not deal with planning matters. It is an attempt to consolidate 300 years of legislation into one Bill. Where matters such as rights of herbiage do not translate easily into modern legislation, the Bill clarifies them in as fair-minded a way as possible and the draftsmen have sought to resolve any ambiguities that exist.

My hon. Friends and I are satisfied that the Bill protects the interests of the citizens of Newcastle and that it will prove a strong safeguard to preserve the town moor in its present form, so that it cannot be encroached upon by property developers. I hope that the House will allow the Bill to be carried over into the next Session and proceed to the statute book thereafter.

The House proceeded to a Division—

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian) (seated and covered): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I have just had the opportunity of voting in the No Lobby and while passing through I noticed a certain amount of smoke coming from a waste-paper basket. Presumably some hon. Member put a lighted cigarette into it. I extinguished that fire. I wonder whether you can give some guidance as to whether hon. Members should be taking such a risk in the Palace of Westminster.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): As I understand it, hon. Members are required not to smoke in either Lobby.

The House having divided: Ayes 100, Noes 37.

8.54 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I urge hon. Members to agree to this Bill being carried over. Many of my hon. Friends and other hon. Members will be aware that, for some considerable time, I have been urging this House to encourage London Regional Transport to go ahead with the improvement of Angel Underground station. That is precisely the purpose of the Bill.

Angel is almost certainly the worst station in the entire Underground system—many hon. Members will have had personal knowledge and experience of that. The Bill contains a number of important measures to ensure that improvement work can go ahead. Principally those measures involve the removal of the present lifts, which work, at best, sporadically, and, at worst, not at all, and their replacement with new escalators leading to a new ticket hall and entrance to the station to be built on Islington high street.

In addition and most importantly, the Bill contains the provision for the removal of the island platform which is located in the middle of the tracks at the station and its substitution by proper normal platforms as in other stations on the Underground system. Presently the island platform is extremely dangerous, especially with the enormous increase in the numbers of people who use Angel. In recent years, in the immediate vicinity of that station a large amount of office development has taken place. That has meant that the number of people using that station has considerably increased. During the rush hour the press of people trying to get on and off the island platform has become great. The obvious danger to passenger safety should be all too clear to the House, especially on the day when we have considered the report of the inspector into the King's Cross tragedy. The safety of passengers in other stations on the Underground system should be uppermost in our minds.

The Bill will seek to put many of the problems right and it is important that the carry-over motion is passed by the House to ensure that the necessary work can take place as quickly as possible.

It is not entirely the fault of the promoters that a carry-over motion has become necessary. The Bill was tabled at a fairly late stage of the Session principally and regrettably because it took the Government some considerable time to come forward with the capital funding necessary to ensure that the work could proceed. I am delighted that that financial commitment has now been made by the Government to ensure that that work can be done, but it is a pity that it took so long for that commitment to be forthcoming. There were also lengthy discussions between London Regional Transport and the borough of Islington about the precise way in which the work should be carried out, the location of the new entrance and the detail of the necessary construction to improve the station.

All those discussions have now reached a positive conclusion and there are no outstanding petitions against the Bill.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): Will my hon. Friend put our minds at ease so that we may be absolutely sure that there are no outstanding petitions and that all the problems have been solved? I apologise to my hon. Friend for not being absolutely in the know about what has happened to this Bill, but there are many private Bills and it is simply not possible for any Member to know exactly what is going on at any stage.

Mr. Smith: I can certainly assure my hon. Friend on that point. The motion specifically says that there are no outstanding petitions against the Bill. I urge hon. Members on both sides to vote for the motion. My constituents and I have asked for these works for many years. At long last, in the past year, we have secured the agreement of LRT and the funding commitments from the Government that will ensure that they can go ahead.

The station is in dire need of improvement. Safety considerations are overwhelming, and I very much hope that proceedings on the Bill can be concluded in both Houses as rapidly as possible so that the works can commence as soon as possible.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I am in complete agreement with the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith).

I should declare an interest as a director of a company which has recently moved to the area close to Angel tube station, in White Lion street. The building is used by more than 400 accountancy students each day. It is symptomatic of the improvement in the area that many businesses are moving into the streets surrounding the tube station, and it is only right that London Regional Transport should succeed in upgrading the station, thereby improving the conditions of houses and businesses in that part of north-east London.

I hope that the Bill will have a speedy passage and that LRT will treat safety as a priority, remembering that litter and the general lack of cleanliness helped to fuel the awful tragedy at King's Cross. The station is a disgrace at the moment and the improvements will increase the comfort of residents and business users and of all who travel through the area. I welcome the Bill.

9.2 pm

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I do not intend to vote against the Bill, which, on balance, is a good one. I do not know the details of the changes to the Angel station. Perhaps the Bill's promoters or my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) can provide me with reassurances that will enable me to vote for the Bill with enthusiasm rather than passivity.

We know LRT's record. I do not blame it for trying to cut the manpower and womanpower involved in rubbish collection, maintenance and servicing the Underground system. LRT is the monkey in the game: the organ grinder is the Department of Transport. The Secretary of State for the Environment is the man who should have resigned over the King's Cross disaster if he had had any integrity.

The Department of Transport has authority over LRT's actions. It is plain for all to see that any Bill brought forward by LRT will be coloured by the financial constraints of the Department of Transport. We now have what are called Thatcherite policies—value for money, efficiency and no waste——

Mr. Hanley: Does the hon. Gentleman not recognise substantial investment in public transport when he sees it? Is that not in itself a reason to support the Bill?

Dr. Marek: I believe these things when I see them. None of us has seen the Bill. We have seen a few words on paper, but I have not seen the works and improvements that are planned for the Underground station.

Mr. Chris Smith: My hon. Friend is right, in general terms, to be sceptical about the role of the Department of Transport—especially that of the Secretary of State—in the funding of LRT. The Angel tube station is on the City branch of the Northern line, which is the Cinderella of the Underground service. Many improvements in the frequency of trains and quality of service are needed, and I am already pressing the Secretary of State for them.

My hon. Friend asked about the specific works that are included in the Bill. I refer him to the estimates of expense, which have been tabled and are before the House. The overall total is nearly £45 million. That is the amount required to carry out these important works at Angel Underground station. That is a substantial and an adequate amount.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman is providing information, but he is making another speech. I must ask him to bring his intervention to a close.

Mr. Smith: I was just concluding my intervention. This is a substantial and adequate investment to carry out the works in the Bill.

Dr. Marek: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for seeking to reassure me on these matters. The estimates come to about £44 million, and that is a lot of money. On the other hand, in today's world, and at today's prices, I wonder what one would get for that amount.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Without disputing the need for the work to be carried out at Angel station, some of us will be anxious to know whether the expenditure there will be within a far too limited budget, which will mean that the needs of other Underground stations may be neglected. Is my hon. Friend aware that unless we have an assurance that other funds will be available we shall have some hesitation in supporting our hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) because he may wish to put too many of the rather limited number of eggs in a basket that is rather too small?

Dr. Marek: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention. Perhaps he will have a chance to develop his ideas later in the debate.

We are debating a carry-over motion because certain things should have been done in a certain way and were not. That has created problems. Every hon. Member has a right to worry about what is going on and to wonder whether the £44 million will be spent properly. Secondly, is it sufficient to undertake specific works? I shall deal with one or two of the things that I mean.

In the past six or seven years, London Regional Transport has undertaken works in such a way as to spend the minimum amount of money necessary to get the public to use the Underground. It has not spent a penny more than was necessary, yet if it had spent a few more pennies it could have given the travelling public the comfort and the luxury that they desire.

The Underground walkways are far too narrow, and at times during the rush hour there is simply not enough room for people to get to or from the platforms. The frequency of service at some Underground stations is such, perhaps because of out-of-date signalling equipment or because there are not enough trains, that many people on the platform cannot get on the train and have to wait for the next one. In some cases people are not allowed on to the platform.

This important Bill is about the refurbishment and rearrangement of the Angel Underground station. The question that we must ask about any carry-over motion is whether the promoters of the Bill have got it right, so that the money will be properly spent and the House can give a fair wind to the motion. The other question that we must ask is whether the money will be spent in a cheeseparing way, because, given the expected increase in passenger traffic, very soon, and perhaps even before the works are completed, we shall see that the works were inadequate and that too many passengers are using the station in unsuitable conditions.

That is why we must consider whether we should allow the Bill to go through, or whether we should stop it at this stage because the House believes that the money is insufficient or is not directed appropriately and it is better to ask the promoters to think again.

My hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury has persuaded me that it would be reasonable to allow the Bill to be carried over into the next Session, but I wish to ask a few simple questions. The answers may be in the Bill or may already have been given in Committee, but it is difficult for any hon. Member to know the details of a private Bill. I apologise if I ask questions to which I should know the answers, but I should like to know whether escalators will be provided from ground level to the booking hall. That is important. We should all welcome £44 million being spent to refurbish the Angel station. If these questions can be answered in the affirmative——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am extremely tolerant when I am in the Chair, but we are now going into deep water. I remind the hon. Gentleman—if I may have his attention—that this is a carry-over motion and that we are not now dealing with the details of the Bill. We are determining whether the Bill should be carried over into the next Session. The debate is therefore very narrow.

Dr. Marek: I apologise for straying into too much detail. I do not intend to detain the House for much longer.

Mr. Chris Smith: I urge my hon. Friend to allow the Bill to be carried over because the issues that he has raised have been resolved in the discussions between the various parties. Works Nos. 1 and 2 in the Bill cover the provision of escalators.

Dr. Marek: Let me justify my case, Madam Deputy Speaker, without going into the details. I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to satisfy me on this point. If so, I promise that I shall not raise it again. I shall listen to his comments and decide which way to vote. Obviously, escalators will be included, but will they be from ground level to the booking hall?

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are going into the details of the Bill. I have drawn the hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that we are not dealing with the details of the Bill. They have already been dealt with. We are dealing with whether the Bill should be carried over into the next Session. That is the only thing with which he should concern himself now.

Dr. Marek: I am slowly being hemmed in. If the Bill is carried over to the next Session, there will be plenty of time to consider all these details. I hope that we will be able to consider them carefully, to ensure that the Bill is right. We may sniff at £44 million, but the Government are now intending to allow London Regional Transport to invest that money. We all agree that that investment is necessary, but is it right? This money will be included in the public sector borrowing requirement.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is now straying.

Dr. Marek: That is an important matter that we can discuss when the Bill has been carried over. I hope that I shall be able to support my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury when he gives me an assurance that all those things will be looked at—perhaps they have been looked at and I need have no qualms whatsoever about supporting him in carrying over the Bill.

9.15 pm

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) suggested that I intervene, and I shall do so very briefly. I shall certainly bear in mind your reminder to the House that this is a very narrow matter, Madam Deputy Speaker. I shall restrict my remarks to that narrowness.

My basic concern is about escalators and the time scale to which my hon. Friend referred. Occasionally I have to use Pimlico Underground station. During the past four or five months, whenever I have used the station, an escalator has been closed for what is said to be repairs. I was told that it was under repair last week, the week before, the week before that and way back in June or July. I am worried that if we agree to the carry-over motion, presumably it will be quite some time before the Bill is given further, and presumably final, consideration in the next Session, and it may be that the Pimlico escalator will be waiting for months while London Regional Transport tries to make sure that the £40 million or so earmarked for Angel station remains available for that station.

I feel somewhat hesitant about making that point because I have quite enough to do to represent my impoverished, hard-hit Yorkshire constituency, but since the Conservatives who control the City of Westminster spend their time selling public assets for extremely small sums of money, and, presumably, travel around in chauffer-driven cars and do not know what is happening to their constituents who have to climb down a very long staircase, which must be distressing for the aged and the disabled, I feel entitled, even though my constituency is 170 miles away, to offer this very narrow point for the consideration of the House.

Mr. Chris Smith: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. I would point out ever so gently that many hundreds of my constituents, many of them impoverished or elderly, have to walk up and down extremely antiquated, very steep stairs when the lifts at Angel tube station are out of action, as they frequently are. With the interests of those people in mind, I have been fighting extremely hard and vigorously for this Bill for many months.

Mr. Hardy: I commend my hon. Friend for the diligent service that he has given to his constituency. I was delighted to give way so that he could make that valid point. He is valiantly seeking to ensure that his constituents do not have to undergo the experience suffered by so many people in Pimlico as a result of the almost incessant failures to operate the escalators there.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that the problem of non-functioning escalators in London is now substantial. Rotherhithe tube station in my constituency——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have intervened twice in the debate already to draw the attention of hon. Members to the fact that we are not concerned with individual escalators and lifts not working. We are debating a carry-over motion. I ask hon. Members to discipline their arguments to that.

Mr. Hughes: I was about to convince you, Madam Deputy Speaker, that it was a perfectly appropriate intervention. Constituents in London wish that we did not have so much carrying-over of repairs, and that we had less need to carry over the legislation. The sooner we get the legislation, the sooner we will get the repairs and the less need we will have for debates such as this.

Mr. Hardy: I usually find myself in substantial disagreement with members of the SLD, but I am glad that I gave way to the hon. Gentleman. He touched on an important matter, but he obviously disregarded the advice that you had given, Madam Deputy Speaker, about the narrowness of the subject. I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman again because, clearly, he will be out of order if I do so.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) will remain in order.

Mr. Hardy: I have been in order from the start of my remarks.

I do not believe that we should oppose the Bill, because we should sustain the case put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). The needs of his constituents are such that even if it leads to Angel, Islington, having a higher value on a Monopoly board, which it may as a result of the investment in his constituency, it is right that the elderly and disabled people in his constituency should have their interests served. I hope that the carry-over motion will be passed and that the legislation will move on rapidly. During the period of delay, however long it may be, I trust that London Regional Transport will find a corner of its heart, a little of its money and perhaps a trifle of its commitment to ensure that the escalator at Pimlico station is repaired after these many months.

Dr. Marek: I want to raise an important item which I should have mentioned earlier. It is not a detail, but is a major alteration. My hon. Friend will be aware that a London Regional Transport plan is to be published within the next few months. That will propose vital alterations to public transport in the London area. One of the suggestions is for a lozenge-shaped, fast transit system with one apex of the lozenge at Angel and the other in the south-west of London. That is a major plan for London and I wonder whether the Bill, if it is worth carrying over, will take account of any proposals that might come from that major addition to London Regional Transport.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I ask the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) not to stray down that road, but to return to the carry-over motion.

Mr. Hardy: I would not take up those comments, because my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham may be causing difficulties. If he makes this matter more complex, there is a risk of delay. We must not give the Government too many things to think about at the same time. If we do, the delay will be considerable.

I do not oppose investment in transport. I have every sympathy with people who live in London, but I hope that those who live in south Yorkshire, who also need more money for public transport, will receive support. The pensioners in and around Hoober Stand, the highest point of my constituency, have no bus service, and many of them are too old to walk the considerable distance to a bus stop. People such as that need to be considered.

If we facilitate the Conservative Members who feel that London Regional Transport should have investment, we should congratulate them on their service and support for the public sector. It is nearly as commendable as the devoted service that my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury has given to his constituency. I hope that Conservative Members will accept that a higher priority needs to be shown to public transport in other parts of the country, not just to the escalator at Pimlico, but to the pensioners and disabled in rural areas who have been hit harshly by the appalling public transport policies that the Government have slavishly pursued.

I hope that London Regional Transport will have heard my comments about the escalator at Pimlico. I certainly would not wish to oppose the progress that my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury's constituency desperately needs.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): I received some helpful assurances earlier from the Chairman of Ways and Means about the principles of private Bills. The Bill gives me an opportunity to return to some of the issues raised in the special Committee's report on private business procedure.

In the previous debate we witnessed what I often refer to as the blackmail effect, whereby hon. Members can block or slow down the effect of one Bill to peddle constituency interests or other interests. That is a common feature of transport Bills, especially those introduced by British Rail. Examples of London Underground stations not functioning efficiently can be brought to the House's attention on Bills such as this. Unless the promoters improve the Bill, hon. Members may delay it.

If it is reasonable for London Transport to impose penalty fares on people who do not have tickets, surely those people should be able to impose a penalty on London Transport if its facilities are not working. We have heard examples of such failings from my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy), who mentioned Pimlico, and the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who mentioned Wapping.

The Bill should not be promoted as a local private Bill. If people are to be subjected to penalty fares if they travel on trains and buses without a ticket in London, surely the same should apply in Bristol, Manchester, Birmingham or elsewhere. If penalty fares are to be introduced, they should be made the subject of national legislation moved by the Government so that people who move from one part of the country to another know exactly what the rules and regulations are and what the consequences will be if they do not obtain a ticket. There is no possible justification for having one scheme of penalty fares in London but another in Sheffield or elsewhere. The willingness of the House to allow carry-over motions or Bills such as this to proceed under the private Bill procedure is an encouragement to the Government not to take national measures but to allow private business to proceed in a piecemeal way.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): One needs to consider all the issues involved while remaining in order. I have been fortunate enough to travel on trains on the continent. It was extremely useful to be able to buy one's ticket on the train. In this country, we have to pay before we get on the train. My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett) is rightly stressing the way in which penalty fares should apply throughout the regions. South Yorkshire had an excellent bus service before it was destroyed by the Tories. London Transport should be considering the system that we previously had in south Yorkshire, which was tremendously popular with the people of south Yorkshire. The tragedy is that British Rail appears to be learning nothing. It is merely seeking ways and means of collecting money, and I do not argue with that, but if people had concentrated their minds a little more we might not have had the tragedy at King's Cross that we discussed earlier today. British Rail should perhaps consider its priorities and try to ensure that people, when travelling, are a great deal safer than they are now.

Mr. Bennett: My hon. Friend illustrates the point. We should not be considering penalty fares in terms of piecemeal legislation of this kind. There should be one scheme for the whole country so that people who move from one area to another will know what the rules are. It seems very odd to have one set of penalties in one part of the country and another elsewhere. This is a good illustration of the need to develop national legislation to deal with the problem of fare dodgers rather than having individual Bills of this kind. It is thus a good example of a carry-over motion that we could defeat so as to remind the promoters of private Bills that they should not take the House of Commons for granted and should look for ways of developing public rather than private legislation. That would certainly be most useful.

If, on the other hand, the promoters succeed in getting their carry-over motion, they must consider how they intend to justify the penalty system contained in the Bill. The penalty for travelling on a bus or on the Docklands railway without a fare is a £5 fine, but on trains it is £10. In my experience, it is fairly difficult to get on a bus without paying a fare or having the opportunity to do so as there is usually a driver at the entrance or a conductor inside the bus to issue tickets. In most circumstances, therefore, it will be fairly clear whether a person is trying to avoid payment. Moreover, if a person does not have the necessary fare at that moment but has an urgent need to travel it is possible to explain the circumstances to the driver or conductor and hope to be allowed to pay later.

On the railways, and especially the Underground, however, the situation is far more complicated and it is fairly common for people to have to board a train without having had the opportunity to purchase a ticket. Service at Westminster tube station is generally very good, but at 11.30 or 11.45 in the evening the individual in the ticket office may be busily engaged in counting the day's takings and unwilling to issue a ticket, preferring the would-be traveller to pay at the other end. That may cause considerable difficulty for the individual who, to satisfy the conditions laid down in clause 5 of the Bill, has to prove that there was no one available to issue a ticket. Perhaps the Minister for Roads and Traffic, who is present in the Chamber, can tell us whether a person busily counting the day's takings would count as a person available to issue a ticket even though he might not wish to be distracted from his counting and if the would-be traveller lingers any longer at the window there is a good chance that he will miss the last train. The position is fairly vague.

[Mr. Bennett]

It is often quite difficult to tell whether it will be possible to obtain a ticket at a tube station. There may be a machine issuing 50p tickets, but all the other machines may be shut down and the ticket office closed. In those circumstances, difficulties may arise under clause 5(2)(b)(ii). We should not be considering this legislation through the private Bill procedure. Legislation on penalty fares should be national, not local, because it would then be subject to much more vigorous scrutiny.

A private Bill may or may not be debated on Second Reading. Often it goes through without debate because no one has been alerted to its consequences. A Bill dealing with penalty fares is not really of local interest, so unless someone is especially concerned about the civil rights of individuals——

Ms. Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): I do not quite understand what my hon. Friend is saying. Will penalty fares be automatic, regardless of any mitigating defence? For example, what happens if someone decides to extend his journey? What if he were given the incorrect fare when he began his journey? Will mitigating circumstances be taken into account, or will the penalty be automatic?

Mr. Bennett: I must be careful not to stray too far into the detail of the legislation as we are simply debating a carry-over motion. I refer my hon. Friend to clause 5, which deals with penalty fares in trains. I am sure that the fact that the wrong fare had originally been issued or that there was no one available to issue the ticket would be a reasonable defence. I am not sure whether changing one's mind during the journey would constitute a reasonable defence.

I am trying to explain why private legislation is not the best way to deal with these matters. At best, Second Reading takes place between 7 o'clock and 10 o'clock—a maximum of three hours. If votes have taken place at 7 o'clock, even less time is available. It is much too short a time to debate such a matter as the rights and wrongs of penalty fares. Following Second Reading, the Bill goes into Committee, where petitioners are heard. If a member of the public is well organised, he may present a petition against penalty fares.

The Government have the opportunity to put their point of view, but there is no opportunity for the detailed scrutiny that a Bill would normally receive in a Standing Committee. The number of Members serving on a public Bill Committee is substantial, and each has the opportunity to table amendments. There would be real scope for those outside to make representations to their Members of Parliament on, for example, what would constitute a reasonable defence—the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, South (Ms. Primarolo).

Although the public Bill procedure is not perfect—indeed, some would criticise it—it is far more effective than private legislation, which has a Committee of only four people who decide between different vested interests. They act almost as judges. The private Bill procedure is inappropriate for this sort of legislation.

Once a private Bill has been through its Committee stage, it returns to the Floor of the House, and I accept that, from then on, the procedure for Report and Third Reading is exactly the same as that for public Bills. There is a tendency for private Bills to be nobody's responsibility. The Government have a responsibility to put forward public Bills, and the Opposition have a responsibility to scrutinise them. The issues in Bills are then examined. Private legislation is promoted by organisations outside the House. They persuade an hon. Member to pilot a Bill through the House, and often give that hon. Member little information about it. It is then merely a matter of luck whether other hon. Members take the trouble to read the Bill.

I have been amazed at the number of occasions on which I have picked up a Bill, started to raise one or two points in the House, and then other hon. Members have raised a series of other issues because they have taken the trouble to read the Bill and see its implications. It has often been pure chance that I have taken any interest in certain Bills.

It is inappropriate to use private legislation for such a fundamental principle as whether there should be penalty fares for fare dodgers. If fare dodging is a national problem, it should be subject to national legislation.

The way in which private and public legislation can be muddled is interesting. This is a private Bill, and its promoters have tried to get it through Parliament on that basis. However, there is a problem with private legislation, and that is how to take account of inflation when setting fees. The promoters then dodge the problem by using the public Bill procedure to allow the Secretary of State, by order, to prescribe any increase.

We have a peculiar situation. Although the Bill has short-circuited the normal scrutiny of a public Bill to catch fare dodgers, when they consider whether £5 or £10 will be appropriate for all time, the promoters turn to the dodge that, in future, the Secretary of State will be able to lay an order to increase or decrease the amount. They then follow the procedure of least parliamentary scrutiny, and that is to lay an order that is subject to annulment. All hon. Members know the difficulties in praying against an order and defeating it. The process is in favour of the Government and stacked against ordinary hon. Members. If it is reasonable for the promoters of the Bill to take powers to require the Secretary of State to vary penalties from time to time, the matter should be subject to an affirmative order. It will be possible for the House to debate that point when the Bill comes back to the House.

On this occasion it would be useful for the House not to support the motion and for the Bill to be lost at this point. If London Regional Transport or any other transport undertaking considers it necessary to have penalty fares, it should lobby the Department of Transport to legislate on penalty fares so that people know exactly what is happening.

9.45 pm

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I echo the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish (Mr. Bennett). I do not intend to detain the House for long, but I have considerable sympathy with the argument, and I can illustrate it by telling the House about my experience this week.

Earlier this week, I had to go to Bonn. I could not go the night before, because we were busy opposing another piece of private legislation even more pernicious than this one. I had to get up quite early in the morning to go to Heathrow. When I got to the Underground station, no one was there. As I had to catch the early flight to attend my meeting, I had to board the train without a ticket. Obviously, one pays at the other end. As far as I can see, one cannot get out at Heathrow without paying, and it was certainly not my intention to do so. I strongly disapprove of those who do not pay their way. There are far too many tax dodgers on the Conservative Benches for us to endorse any other view.

I had completed about three quarters of my journey when an inspector boarded the train. I explained that I could not buy a ticket because there was no one at the Underground station where my journey had begun. He was extremely courteous, and I paid my normal fare. It is wrong that even in London, where there is high unemployment, those responsible for public transport cannot employ people to sell tickets at the beginning of a journey.

Mr. Redmond: I know from experience that my hon. Friend is impeccably dressed when he travels abroad to represent this country. I wonder what the ticket inspector's attitude would have been had my hon. Friend been wearing overalls? The inspector may have assumed that my hon. Friend was seeking to dodge paying.

Mr. Hardy: As a matter of fact, a young man wearing jeans, which were not particularly new—I think that is the most charitable way of putting it—was in exactly the same boat and he was treated with considerable courtesy by that honourable and experienced inspector or ticket collector. However, the fact remains that that inspector could have been subject to considerable criticism and abuse because people do not like being put in a position of having to travel without a ticket simply because of the mean approach to the employment of people. As I have said, there is high unemployment even in London. It seems that our society has reached a point where adding to the labour force is regarded as almost a crime if there is any way to avoid doing so. It seems absurd for us to pass legislation that will strengthen that reluctance to employ people and to give them responsible jobs.

My hon. Friend the Member for Denton and Reddish is right. This is not the way to deal with matters that involve such serious principles. We should argue this approach in a proper debate, not in this travesty of a procedure where most Members of Parliament feel that, as this is a matter for London Transport, it is not for them. I believe that the principle is important, and I am delighted that my hon. Friend has suggested that we should ensure that there is a substantial debate. I hope that the Minister will comment on this matter——

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Peter Bottomley) indicated dissent.

Mr. Hardy: Well, he should, because he is saying that people are to be frequently placed—perhaps more frequently placed—in the embarrassing position of having to board public transport without having paid the fare and then run the risk of being criticised, embarrassed or made to feel guilty when there are no grounds for criticism, embarrassment or guilt. The Government have a responsibility, and the Minister should be asked to reconsider his negative response—a curt shake of his head—to my suggestion that he intervene.

There is an element of confusion in clause 5(2)(a), although perhaps lawyers in the House would not find it as confusing as I do. It seems that the Minister, or the sponsor of the Bill, may say that my point about people travelling without a ticket has been covered. Clause 5(2)(a) states:

> "A person . . . shall not be liable to pay a penalty fare under this section if at the time when and the station where he started to travel on the train service there were no facilities available for the sale of the necessary fare ticket for his journey."

In other words, he may be excused.

It is a bit much that we have to pass a Bill to say that people will be excused a penalty when they are not in any way at fault. Would it not be better to ensure that such a position never arose? Would it not be better to ensure that we do not clutter the House of Commons with unnecessary private legislation when proper employment policies could be pursued? Is that not a sufficient argument for the Minister to take the trouble to get to his feet and say a word or two on the subject? He should reconsider it.

The confusion is that, while there appears to be some degree of exclusion in clause 5(2), paragraph (c) states that if a notice was displayed or an authorised person in uniform gave permission, the penalty would not be applied. If clause 5(2) is satisfactory, why do we need paragraph (c)(i) and (ii)? The Bill should be reviewed and the principles considered. London Transport and any other public transport authority should ensure that it employs a sufficient number of people so that ordinary decent citizens are not severely embarrassed.

9.50 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton): I shall not detain the House for long.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: That is a nice tie.

Mr. Cohen: Yes, I have a nice tie, and a nice pair of braces too, which I am wearing for the first time tonight. But I digress. The Minister is leading me down the wrong path.

I do not object to the carry-over motion, although I agree that this matter should be subject to national rather than local legislation. I agree, too, with my hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) that tickets should always be available for people when they set out on a journey. They should not be forced to travel without tickets. That relates to employment, and people should be employed in those jobs as they provide an important service.

I am worried about penalty fares and would not like them cast in stone. There must be flexibility. All hon. Members will know of cases of violence against those who work on our buses and tubes. There have been appalling cases, involving deaths. Only recently work was stopped at Leyton garage for the funeral of a bus conductor who was assaulted and died as a consequence. I am worried that if we set penalty fares in stone they could become a reason for violence. Even if the sum involved is small, a person who does not have that small sum might think it better to hit the conductor or driver and get away without being caught. At present there is a big advertising campaign about getting a ticket rather than a criminal record, and I agree with that, but violence is connected to that.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett: Does my hon. Friend agree that if inspectors are expected to collect penalty fares, as is proposed, the inspector will end up carrying large sums if he catches many offenders? The legislation should discourage people from carrying substantial sums. The more we can persuade people to pay other than in cash, so that no one is tempted to assault an inspector and grab the money, the better. If this were national legislation, we should consider the safety of inspectors who collect penalties.

Mr. Cohen: That is an excellent point. I agree that in the present climate vast amounts of money should not be carried around because that is almost an invitation to assault.

I have not been fully briefed by LRT—perhaps other hon. Members have—about potential violence and how it could flow from penalty fares. The promoters do not seem to have made that clear. For example, have the trade unions been consulted? I should have thought that that was vital.

I acknowledge that the courts have an important role to play. In general, I favour lighter penalties. I make no bones about that. This country imposes some of the heaviest penalties in Europe. I think that sentences should be much lighter. However, we should take into account the social element in sentencing and the courts must deal rigorously with assaults on bus drivers, tube workers and others in the public transport services. I am in favour of harsher sentences in those circumstances.

There is also the question of fares. At the moment, fare increases are well above the rate of inflation, and that seems to have been so for a number of years. That may mean that more people will be tempted to try to avoid paying their fares, which again could lead to potential violence. I should not object to penalty fares if they were being introduced against a background of cheap fares, giving people no excuse for trying to avoid payment, but while fares are increasing well above inflation there is a problem.

Mrs. Audrey Wise (Preston): Clause 8 requires a person to give his name and address if he cannot pay the penalty fare immediately. Has LRT considered that if a person's name and address are on the computer the information must then be covered by the Data Protection Act 1984? There seems to be no recognition of that in the Bill.

Mr. Cohen: That is a very good point. I was once described by a Home Office Minister as an aficianado of data protection. If I went into that question, I would be here all night.

I have expressed my view about the potential for violence. I would ask LRT to comment on how penalty fares may affect it.

9.58 pm

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I take part in the debate as a Member sponsored by the National Union of Railwaymen, but I also have a personal interest in ensuring that the Bill is the best that can be produced. It seems to me that it would not do any harm for LRT to take the Bill away and bring it back in a much improved form.

My hon. Friends have made all the points that need to be made. It is important that those who have to exact penalty fares should not be subjected to violent attacks. Would it not be better if the system were properly staffed so that it was difficult to escape payment? That would mean that fewer penalty fares would have to be collected.

Clause 5(5) implies that a person is guilty until he can prove himself innocent. Surely it would be better to phrase that provision so that a person is deemed innocent until proved guilty. I wonder whether the employees represented by their unions have been properly consulted.

It must be in the interests of everybody that no one should get away with not paying the proper fare. That is anti-social, wrong, and it should be stopped. But should it be stopped in this way? I do not believe that the Bill is the right way forward.

It would not do any harm whatever for London Regional Transport to take the Bill away and perhaps talk to the unions, the London boroughs and people in the community to find out how they would want such a system to operate.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Monday 14 November.

Consumer Protection

10.1 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Eric Forth): I beg to move,

That the draft Consumer Protection Act 1987 (Commencement No. 2) Order 1988, which was laid before this House on 28th July, be approved.

The purpose of this commencement order is simply to put into effect the provisions of the Consumer Protection Act 1987, which repeal the Trade Descriptions Act 1972. I am aware of the widespread concern that the prospect of this repeal has aroused, both publicly and in this House, since it was announced in October 1986. The issues here are more complex than they might at first appear and have not always been perfectly understood. I hope, therefore, that it will assist the House if I spend a little time outlining the background.

The 1972 Act requires goods made abroad but supplied here bearing a United Kingdom name or mark, or anything likely to be taken as such, also to be marked with a conspicuous indication of their country of origin. I should stress that the Act does not require United Kingdom-made goods, nor imported goods without markings, to be marked with their country of origin. Nor does it require goods to be origin marked as a condition of entry to the United Kingdom. This has not been required since 1968.

The 1972 Act originated as a private Member's Bill in response to fears, especially on the part of industry, that imported goods would be widely supplied under well known United Kingdom brand names which could suggest that they were of United Kingdom origin. Those fears sprang from the ending of compulsory origin marking of imported goods as a result of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968. That Act revised and reformed the then existing merchandise marks legislation, but did not re-enact the origin marking requirements of the Merchandise Marks Act 1926. The 1926 Act, first, required the origin marking of imported goods bearing the names of United Kingdom traders; and, secondly, conferred powers to require the origin marking of unmarked imported goods, either at point of sale or of import. By 1968 more than 100 such orders had been made in relation to specific goods. They were preserved for a transitional period of three years. The object of the Trade Descriptions Act 1972 was then to re-enact the principal requirement of the 1926 Act at the end of that transitional period.

That was supplemented in 1981 by the Trade Descriptions (Origin Marking) (Miscellaneous Goods) Order, which required virtually all clothing and textiles, footwear, cutlery and domestic electrical appliances to be marked with their country of origin at the point of retail supply, irrespective of whether the goods were made in the United Kingdom or abroad and whether or not they bore any brand names or trade marks. The order was made on the basis that such information was generally useful to the consumer.

Fairly soon after it was made, the order was the subject of European Community infraction proceedings and, although vigorously defended by the United Kingdom before the European Court of Justice, it was found to be incompatible with article 30 of the treaty of Rome, which prohibits barriers to imports between EC member states. In the court's view, the effect of that legal obligation was to enable consumers to distinguish between domestic and imported goods, and thus to assert any prejudices that they might have against products solely because of national origin. This was likely to have the effect of increasing the costs of imported goods and of making it more difficult to sell them on the United Kingdom market. The court also rejected the argument that the requirement was necessary to protect the consumer. If it were advantageous for manufacturers to indicate national origin, they were quite free to do so voluntarily and legal compulsion was unnecessary. The protection of consumers was adequately safeguarded by measures prohibiting false or misleading indications of origin and these measures were not called in question by the treaty.

As the House knows, two years ago the European Community Commission commenced further formal infraction proceedings against the United Kingdom on the ground that the 1972 Act was also incompatible with article 30 of the treaty of Rome. After careful consideration of the legal position, especially the earlier decision of the court, we concluded, reluctantly, that the United Kingdom could not expect to be successful in defending the Act.

I think that it is important that the current Commission challenge is seen against that background. Article 30 of the treaty prohibits quantitative restrictions on imports between member states or measures having equivalent effect. Case law has established that this includes any trading rule enacted by a member state which is capable, directly or indirectly, actually or potentially, of hindering intra-Community trade. The treaty provides certain exceptions to this rule, but they do not include the purpose of consumer protection other than the protection of health or life. Again, however, the case law has recognised this as a legitimate purpose for national measures provided that certain conditions are fulfilled. In the context of the 1972 Act, the major considerations are that a measure must serve a necessary consumer protection requirement; that it must be proportionate to that purpose, that is to say, it must go no further than is necessary to achieve it; and that there must be no discrimination between United Kingdom goods and those of other member states.

While we and the Commission fully accept the necessity of protecting consumers from misleading indications, I am afraid that the 1972 Act clearly exceeds those conditions. To begin with, it imposes no requirements in respect of British-made goods: it applies only to imported goods, including those from other member states. The original complaint triggering the EC's challenge was from a multinational company that was the proprietor of the same trade mark in all the member states. It produced goods in a number of member states. Because it applied its own trade mark to those goods—a "UK mark" by definition under the 1972 Act—it was obliged also to indicate the country of origin on those goods in order that liability to prosecution would be avoided when the goods were supplied in the United Kingdom. Clearly, therefore, the Act discriminates between United Kingdom goods and goods from other member states.

While the 1972 Act may have been conceived originally to prevent the consumer from being misled about the origin of goods, in this case by using the criterion of United Kingdom names or marks, it goes considerably further than that. Virtually any name or mark used in trade in the United Kingdom falls within the definition of

[Mr. Eric Forth]

United Kingdom name or mark, whether or not there is anything potentially misleading about it. Names such as Renault or Volkswagen are, as defined by the Act, United Kingdom names, and country of origin must be indicated even though there may be no question of the consumer being misled as to the country of manufacture. Such names applied to goods made here would not require origin markings. Similarly, a trade mark in the form of a logo or purely pictorial device is deemed by the Act to be potentially misleading as to origin, even in cases where it carries no such connotation. In those respects the requirement to origin mark goes further than is necessary to prevent consumers from being misled, which is a recognised consumer protection purpose.

I have spent some time explaining why it is not realistic for the Government to take this issue before the European Court of Justice. I have done so because I believe that this may not have been fully appreciated when the issue came to a head in late 1986, and in subsequent exchanges in the House during the passage of what is now the Consumer Protection Act 1987, when there was a feeling that the Government should have pressed the matter to that end. I hope that I have demonstrated to the House's satisfaction that this would serve no purpose.

More positively, however, when we accepted the Commission's view of the 1972 Act in terms of EC law, we also made it clear that the United Kingdom intended to institute a successor regime, compatible with treaty obligations, to take effect upon the repeal of the 1972 Act. My predecessors made this clear in answer to a parliamentary question by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) on 1 December 1986, in subsequent answers to other hon. Members and in the debates on the then Consumer Protection Bill.

A second order, the Trade Descriptions (Place of Production) (Marking) Order—which I will call the marking order—was also laid before the House on 19 October to fulfil this commitment. The marking order represents the outcome of wide and lengthy consultation with interested parties, and we have also secured the acceptance by the EC Commission of its terms. Although the marking order is not the subject of this debate, it may be helpful to the House if I explain what it does.

The marking order is made under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968. This Act makes it an offence for a person in the course of a trade or business to apply a false, including misleading, trade description to goods, or to supply or offer to supply goods bearing such a description. A trade description is any indication given in respect of a range of characteristics of goods, including their place of manufacture or production. The Act does not, however, give any guidance as to the circumstances in which a possibly misleading, as distinct from a false, indication of origin should be corrected, or how that should be done. Section 8 of the Act, under which the marking order is made, confers powers to require the marking of goods with information.

The aim of the marking order is, therefore, to set out the circumstances in which a positive, corrective indication of origin is required in order not to commit an offence under the 1968 Act. The essential trigger mechanism is whether the presentation—that is, the packaging, marking, get-up or other indications—of goods would create the impression that they were made somewhere other than where they were actually produced or manufactured. Regard must be had of the totality of the presentation of goods, although certain relevant indications, such as flags, names, persons and so on, are specified in the schedule to the order. Failure to mark goods in the circumstances in which this is required would amount to an offence under section 8(2) of the 1968 Act by anyone supplying or offering or exposing for supply the goods in the course of trade or business.

I outlined earlier the limits imposed by European Community law on national measures of this kind. The marking order does not protect any one national origin. It would apply to misleading suggestions of, for example, German origin as well as of United Kingdom origin. There is, therfore, no element of discrimination against other member states' goods. In European Community terms, as I have said, the 1972 Act may be attacked on the grounds that it is applicable only to imported goods and is directed only to the potential for consumers to be misled as to United Kingdom origin. Moreover, the 1972 Act relates to the use of United Kingdom names or marks per se, whether or not they necessarily suggest United Kingdom origin. The marking order is intended to apply in any circumstances in which purchasers are likely to be misled, and is therefore concerned with the totality of the presentation of goods. The use of a particular language or trade mark is not in itself to be considered as necessarily indicating a particular origin, but, taken in the context of the presentation of the goods as a whole, it may be.

The marking order has been clarified and revised in a number of ways as a result of consultation on its terms. In particular, it now requires a statement of the country of origin of goods as distinct from any other expression of their place of manufacture if the latter could in itself be misleading. If, for example, goods were marked "Made in Sheffield" when they were supplied in the United Kingdom and in reality that marking refers to one of the Sheffields in the United States of America, then the actual country of manufacture would have to be shown. I think that this should allay the concern of manufacturers who pointed to the use of specific place names on goods made elsewhere with the apparent intention of misleading.

The marking order comes into effect on 31 December this year.

I think it is fair to say that, in consultation on the marking order, interested parties—industry, trade, consumer associations and enforcement agencies—have generally accepted that there are now very clear limits on the scope for compulsory origin marking and that the order represents the most that is workable on a national basis, within the confines of our European Community obligations.

I am well aware, however, of continuing concern about orgin marking in the wider context, primarily about goods made elsewhere in the world which are supplied here bearing well-known European names, United Kingdom or otherwise. While such names may not in themselves indicate origin, they may well be closely associated with goods from specific countries or places. Consumers might well assume from some brand names that, for example, electrical or electronic goods were of German or Japanese origin, simply because of such generalised associations. It is not possible, as I have indicated, to go this far in our national legislation on a unilateral basis, and the only possible solution to these outstanding concerns is a European Community regime.

Although the European Community Commission has not, in the more recent past, shown any positive enthusiasm for such an approach, it was not clear whether that reflected the views of the majority of member states. It appears that most member states have some form of regulation of origin marking. A number have modified their requirements as a result of infraction proceedings by the European Community Commission and we understand that several currently face such proceedings in respect of their national legislation. In the light of this, we decided that a way forward might be to establish whether there is any consensus among member states on the desirability of a Community origin marking regime. Such a regime might, of course, take one of a number of forms —for example, a Community-wide requirement, along the lines of the 1972 Act, requiring the country of origin to be indicated when imported third-country goods have the names or marks of persons carrying on business within the Community. I have received a good measure of support from United Kingdom industry for such an initiative, and it is one which I am pursuing. I have written both to the Commission and to my opposite numbers in the other member states on this issue. However, I have to warn the House that progress will be neither easy nor speedy. I have spoken at some length about the past, present and future considerations surrounding these developments——

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Before my hon. Friend leaves that point, and appreciating that it could take some time to get a European mark, will he confirm that there is nothing in the legislation to prevent a "Made in Britain" mark being applied? What efforts are his Department making to encourage a perhaps even better "Made in Britain" mark to be applied?

Mr. Forth: I am glad that my hon. Friend has raised that matter because it is important. I can confirm that there will be nothing to prevent companies that make goods in this country from telling the consumer that that is the case. They will be free to do so if they feel that doing that is in their interests. As people have confidence in the quality of British goods, I am sure that that will be the case. Whether or not it would be for the Department of Trade and Industry to play any part is quite another matter. I think that there is sufficient incentive for companies to do that, and nothing in the order would prevent them from doing so.

Within the constraints imposed by our Community obligations, we have achieved as satisfactory an outcome in this difficult area as it is reasonable to expect. I commend the order to the House.

Mr. Speaker: I should have announced to the House that I have not selected the amendment.

10.15 pm

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I congratulate the Minister both on his appointment and on the passion and eloquence with which he moved this interesting order. He is positively becoming an oratorical Demosthenes of orders. It could not have happened to a nicer guy.

The order shows the reality of grovelling subservience to the Common Market that lies behind the Government's oratorical flourishes against the Market. We see the spectacle of the Prime Minister going round in the broad light of day making loud anti-Common Market and anti-communautaire noises so that she is becoming almost the football hooligan of Europe. It is reported that, when President Mitterrand was asked why he has bilateral talks all the time with the West German Chancellor and does not include Mrs. Thatcher, he said, "Because she disturbs us." That is the noise that the Prime Minister is making for home consumption to conceal the reality of grovelling subservience that we see in the order tonight.

We see that subservience in the abdication over the Cloft scheme for aid to the wool industry and we saw it when the aid for Rover was reduced. We see it in the VAT debacle because VAT has to be imposed on new construction. We see it in the increased taxation on beer to bring it up to the level of wine, in the way that the Single European Act was rushed through the House and in the way in which the increase in contributions has been conceded almost without a murmur despite the fact that last year our net contribution to the budget was £1·7 billion. All that is the reality of subservience behind the Prime Minister's loud anti-European noises.

Mr. John Redwood (Wokingham): Why does the hon. Gentleman think that good cross-party democratic debate is right in this national Parliament and but that the Prime Minister should not be allowed to indulge in good, hard-hitting political debate in Europe even though she has a good vision of Europe and wishes to persuade other nation states in Europe of that vision?

Mr. Mitchell: The answer is straightforward. The Prime Minister is doing this as a tactic for home consumption in order to conceal her own subservience to the EC which is illustrated in this order.

Effectively the Common Market has got us by the rebates. A rebate was conceded to Britain as a gesture, but it was not accompanied by any reform of the fundamental financial basis of the Common Market. We can be threatened with revocation of that rebate and the Prime Minister can be kept in line. She gets that rebate quamdiu se bene gesserit. I use that Latin phrase in order to confuse today's Tory party, which has no noblesse and certainly no oblige and which almost certainly does not understand the language taught in the public schools. If Mrs. Thatcher does not obey the instructions——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must refer to the right hon. Lady as the Prime Minister.

Mr. Mitchell: I apologise, Mr. Speaker. If the Prime Minister does not obey the instructions and accept the humiliations that are forced on her by the EC, the rebate will be effectively revoked. Tonight, in this order, we are rushing to submit—without even being instructed to submit—to what we think the European Court will want us to do. There can be no procedure more humiliating than that.

The 1972 legislation that we shall eliminate through this order was right and fair, has worked well and is a vital piece of consumer protection. It is an opportunity for people to encourage domestic industry by discriminating in their choice against imports. It is a right for those who want to say, "I would rather support jobs in this country than pay increased taxation to support the large numbers of unemployed generated by the scale of imports, particularly from the EEC." The EEC has about 40 per cent. of the car market in this country and it is people's right to discriminate against that in their choices.

It is also people's right to discriminate against regimes of which they do not approve. I draw attention particularly to the question of the boycotts by individuals or Governments of South African produce. That is one way of bringing that country to make concessions domestically. South Africa needs a trade surplus to offset the huge cost of capital flight and its debt repayments. If Governments will not do that—and Governments should do that—the consumer should have the right, by knowing that the origin of goods is South African, to discriminate against them. We can discriminate through the 1972 legislation against manufactured articles that come into this country from South Africa—the kitchenware, plastic goods, paper, printing, textiles and finished garments. There is a right and a principle case for consumers to be able to discriminate against goods of whose origin they disapprove and thus bring effective pressure to bear on those regimes. That right is effectively eliminated by the order.

The order also eliminates information behind consumer choice. Consumer organisations have objected to the repeal of the 1972 legislation because the information that allows consumers to choose is important. Consumers need to know where the materials that they buy come from. All that choice, discrimination and educational information sanctioned by the 1972 Act will be struck down. Although that Act was a private Member's measure, it was actively supported by the Government. The Under-Secretary for Trade and Industry at that time, the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley), spoke of it as "a Bill which is not in conflict with our international obligations or, indeed, the whole drift of thinking on world trade".

He said that the Bill should be supported for the right reason because "it would afford a greater measure of protection against deception of the consumer, and I commend it to the House."

He also said:

"For example, a consumer might want to buy British goods instead of South African goods because he is patriotic or because he is antipathetic towards the country concerned. That is a valid reason for a consumer's choice".

That reason for consumer choice is being removed. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say:

"As far as I know, the Common Market Commission has not proposed any common action on this and has no direction under consideration. It is a matter left primarily to individual nations."

When the then hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough, Mr. Darling, commented

"I do not think that issues of this sort appear in the Rome Treaty. I am sure that if there is any contravention the Under-Secretary will tell us."

the right hon. Gentleman replied:

"No."—[Official Report, 25 February 1972; Vol. 831, c. 1682 and 1734.]

I do not know whether that was a case of the right hon. Gentleman being his normal, helpful self and refusing to answer the question. I take it that he meant that that did not contravene the treaty of Rome, yet that is exactly why we are now repealing this legislation. It is humiliating for this country to have to repeal valid legislation in that fashion without even being told or instructed to do so. We are doing so voluntarily, as a submissive offering.

As it was projected in 1972, when we were told that it did not contravene the treaty of Rome—although we are now told that it does contravene the treaty of Rome—it was just another item on the agenda of deceit that was presented to the country to persuade it to join the Common Market in 1972. It was on a par with Lady Tweedsmuir in the other place saying that there would be a veto over fishing legislation. It was on a par with the pamphlets that were distributed saying how much better off we would be and how much better the weather would be if we entered the Common Market.

The Minister has told us the sad saga that has forced us to withdraw valid and important legislation passed in 1972. The order of 1981 was struck down under article 30 of the treaty of Rome. It is nonsensical because one of the countries that objected to that was West Germany which is foisting on the Common Market butter imports from East Germany, with no hint of their origin, as if they were produced in the Common Market. It is nonsensical because this country has a higher proportion of its domestic markets taken by imports—particularly EEC imports—than any other country within the EEC. Yet our legislation is attacked in this fashion and our Government rush to submit to the EEC before they have even been asked.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that in 1972 his party opposed the legislation that he now supports?

Mr. Mitchell: My party supported the legislation in 1972 for a number of very good reasons which the hon. Gentleman will see if he reads the debate. Therefore, he is incorrect.

The Government are incorrect to submit to the Common Market before being asked. It is not as if the European Court which struck down the 1981 order was a body dedicated to the pursuit of abstract justice or to a serious consideration of the issue. The European Court, which this country has an instinctive tendency to obey, is machinery for pursuing European federalism, for advancing the case of a stronger, more united Europe. That is its commitment. It is not a legal court deciding on the abstract justice of the case. Its purpose is to advance European unity, and it is doing that through this kind of legislation. Therefore, we should not rush to submit to that court or to its decisions.

Other countries have a long backlog of judgments against them on which no action has been taken by the Governments concerned. As the Minister pointed out, other countries in the Common Market—and I wish that he had listed them—have origin marking legislation which has been left intact and which has not been struck down in the way that our legislation has, although our country imports most from the EEC. Other countries have various ways of getting around the decisions of the European Court, particularly through legislation passed at regional level or decisions taken at regional level by the German lander, for example, which the court is very slow to deal with. Yet we rush to obey the European Court as if it were some abstract decision on the justice and merits of the case. It is not, and we should not rush to obey it before being asked.

We have tied our own hands by passing the European Communities Act 1972. If we continued to enforce the law of 1972, and if an importer contested or defied that law, we could not bring him before our courts because our courts would have to rule that European law was superior to ours, because of the European Communities Act 1972. That is the humiliation. The Prime Minister should do something about that matter rather than talking a lot of hot air about her sentiments on the Community when our hands are tied. She should be tackling that issue. Only on that basis can she say what she does.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): Is the hon. Gentleman arguing for withdrawal from the Community? Effectively that is what he is saying. Is it not entirely at variance with what is being said by members of his Front Bench, the Leader of the Opposition and Jacques Delors?

Mr. Mitchell: Personally, I would take the cash in hand and waive the rest. But if the hon. Gentleman had been listening to what I was saying, he would have realised that that is not in any sense what I am arguing. The Prime Minister is beating the anti-Market drum and whipping up support at home while the Government are submitting to every humiliation that the Commission lays before us. The only way to create a certain amount of distance, which we will have to create if we are to rebuild British industry and make the economy strong, is to repeal section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972. It is the Prime Minister's decision, not mine. That action should be behind her words, particularly when we remember that we have turned the 1970 surplus in manufactured trade, which at today's valuation would be about £4 billion, into a deficit which is this year running at £14 billion on an annualised rate. That is a turnround of £18 billion in manufactured trade and represents the export of more than 1 million jobs to the EEC. In spite of that, the Minister is asking us to submit to the humiliation of repealing our own legislation before we are even asked to do so.

The Government have twisted and turned on origin marking. They have tried to decide what to do and have held consultations. The order that is still to come is the Government's fig leaf. They have been saying, "Don't press us on this issue. We shall produce something good." Fortunately, we shall have a chance to debate that issue again, and that is welcome. I am worried about what the Government will put in place of the Trade Descriptions Act 1972. I do not think that it will be adequate. An order under the Trade Descriptions Act 1968 deals with goods only if they are presented in such a way as to deceive the purchaser about where they are produced. The new legislation might be called the Amstrad order. What will the order do about Amstrad or Ford cars which are not made in Britain? What will it do about Vauxhall—a British name—cars, most of which are imported from the EEC? We are worried about what the effects of the legislation will be. It will be no satisfactory substitute for the 1972 legislation, which we should not have rushed to strike down in this way.

The 1972 Act has served us well. It is humiliating for the Government to strike it down. We do not propose to support them in their humiliation. We are against the repeal of the 1972 legislation. Rather than voting against them, we propose to subject them to the more exquisite torture of letting them dangle in their own wind for their own supporters to deal with. I do not propose to embarrass the hon. Members who signed the amendment, which has not been called. I am sure that those hon. Members will have the courage of their convictions. I do not propose to embarrass them by bringing the Opposition into play in their support because that might frighten them off. They might be afraid that they will defeat the Government. I want them to have the guts to vote in support of the views expressed in the amendment, which is right. They can do it. They can resolve the Government's schizophrenia in the only way it can be resolved—within the Tory party itself.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Most of us are delighted to see my hon. Friend the Minister on the Front Bench, knowing that he has made some dramatic and impressive speeches from the Back Benches. However, he gave the impression tonight that perhaps his heart is not in his case. I may be entirely wrong. It is fair to say that having a debate of this magnitude late on a Thursday gives the impression that no one will be aware of it or take note of it, except possibly that splendid organisation on Radio 4, "Yesterday in Parliament".

It is interesting to see the number of Conservative Members present at what would otherwise be a debate in the presence of three or four of the old faithful. That shows that Conservative Members are beginning to become worried—my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister spoke of this in Brussels—about the transfer of power to Brussels and decisions of Parliament being changed by foolish bureaucratic decisions.

We should appreciate what we are being asked to do. We are being asked to repeal, root and branch, an Act that was passed unanimously by Parliament in 1972. It was supported by Ministers because it made a major contribution to consumers. It provided them with information, it was not in conflict with our international obligations and, most important, it afforded the consumer a greater degree of protection against deception. We are repealing an Act that every hon. Member supported because it was good for consumers and because it gave information that would help them. We are chucking out that legislation and destroying it because of the views of the non-elected EEC Commission.

My hon. Friend the Minister will know that it does not matter whether the order is approved or rejected. The Government do not have the power to implement the 1972 law because of the Commission's views, and because of a decision of the European Court. To that extent, the order is irrelevant, but it is important constitutionally.

Why are powers being taken away from the people? Why should housewives not know where goods are made? Why do they want to know? Ministers have said that, for different reasons, people might want to support British industry. The marking of goods created jobs and helped our trade balance. It encouraged British industry, and we should be concerned about that at a time when the Government's economic policy is being put at risk by a trade deficit, almost all of which is with the EEC.

Some people have prejudices and do not like certain foreign countries. Some do not like the Soviet Union, or South Africa, and say, "Given the choice, I should prefer not to buy goods made in that country." Some, for good or bad reasons, think that goods made in certain countries are reliable, but that those made in others are not. Many of our constituents take such decisions daily.

Why is that right of choice being destroyed. The EEC Commission said that "it enabled consumers to assert any prejudices that they might have against foreign products."

If consumers are told the truth, how will it distort trade in Europe? If something is made in France, Germany, Japan or Taiwan, why should consumers be denied that information by the action that we are taking tonight? Why should the unanimous decision of Parliament be overturned merely because of the views of the EEC Commission?

There is another aspect of the matter about which colleagues will be genuinely concerned. We have recently witnessed the changes in the EEC's powers to deal with dumping. Dumping used to be selling goods cheaper than cost price or the price charged on the home market. The Commission has extended that to market share. Before the Trade Descriptions Bill was approved by Parliament on 25 February 1972, the Government were asked specifically, because we were contemplating membership, whether it would be contrary to the treaty of Rome. The clear and precise answer given was that it would not be contrary in any respect.

The action that we are taking tonight is important constitutionally. Whether we approve the order or not, the Act will be dead because of the Commission's decisions. What we do tonight does not matter at all.

On the other hand, it is vital for us to realise what is happening to our country and our sovereignty. EEC bureaucracy, which is non-elected, is requiring the British Parliament to overturn a measure designed to inform and protect consumers which we passed after weeks of debate. To that extent, what we are doing is serious and we are right to draw attention to what is happening.

I hope that the Prime Minister's words in Bruges will reflect a change in our attitude towards the EEC. We are in the Common Market and we really have no way of leaving. The only country to leave was Greenland, and it got out only by getting a Bill passed in every member state, and that could never happen to us. We must get away from the situation in which a non-elected body can tell individual member states, for no good reason, to abandon legislation. This is bureaucratic law rather than parliamentary law.

What is achieved by denying information to consumers? Does it restrict trade to tell people that goods are made in, say, Japan or Taiwan? People should be told the truth. That is what the previous measure did and, in doing that, it served a useful purpose. If a referendum were held in Britain asking people if they wanted to know where goods were made before they purchased them, the vast majority would say yes.

Tonight we are making a major change in our constitution. An encouraging aspect is that, while, sadly —with some honourable exceptions—Labour Members are not discussing these Euro issues, my hon. Friends are becoming greatly concerned about the way in which bureaucratic decisions are interfering unnecessarily with our affairs. We are getting fed up with the way in which the Common Market is more and more reflecting all those things against which our splendid Prime Minister is fighting.

While I am delighted to see the Under-Secretary my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) at the Dispatch Box, I hope that in future he will fight hard to get the EEC to reflect the true meaning of Thatcherism and Conservatism and get away from this nonsense of bureaucracy taking powers away from consumers for no good reason.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) on his appearance at the Dispatch Box, I wish him every success in his new office.

We have been intent on increasing consumer protection, particularly in foodstuffs, and more and more the trend is for manufacturers to declare all ingredients. Until now, all foodstuffs consumed in Britain have been subject to inspection by the nation's health inspectorate. With the implementation of the single European market that will cease; imported food will no longer be guaranteed by our own inspectorate as being of the standard, quality and purity that we have come to expect. Such inspections will be made by the inspectorates in the various producing countries.

That presents us with a dilemma, for the public will undoubtedly wish to discriminate in the food products that they consume. They are bound to have reservations about the source of certain products, and particularly about whether the standard of inspection in the countries of origin are commensurate with the standards which have traditionally been enforced in this country, and which we shall continue to enforce for home-produced products. The order is inconsistent and poses a dilemma for the Government because it effectively denies the consumer knowledge of the original source of the food.

10.45 pm

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): The hour is late——

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. Gentleman has only just come into the Chamber.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman was not here for the opening speeches—[Interruption.] Order. No point of order arises. I decide.

Mr. Aitken: The hour is late and I shall not detain the House for more than a few moments. I simply wish to record my sadness at debating this order tonight. I sound that note of sadness on several different counts. First, I sound it in the direction of my hon. Friend the Minister. I well recall him in his former seat below the Gangway, unsheathing his sword so that, with measured tones, he could plunge its point into Minister after Minister who introduced measures that trod, by even a small margin, on British sovereignty.

I could hardly believe my ears tonight as I listened to my hon. Friend's high-speed, staccato delivery as he rattled through some amazing phrases. He said that Renault and Volkswagen were really United Kingdom names; that we were doing the most that was workable within the constraints of our European obligations; that progress would be neither easy nor speedy; that the totality of presentation did not need British marks upon it. It recalled to mind the opening words of Browning's famous poem, "The Lost Leader":

"Just for a handful of silver he left us,
Just for a riband to stick in his coat."

I do not mean to do more than treat my hon. Friend to the sort of treatment that he gave out in his day. He dished it out pretty well, and it is right that he should take it tonight.

I am sad not simply because of such a change of tone by my hon. Friend. He will have plenty to time of repent at leisure in due course. The sadness is that the order affects this sovereign Parliament, of which we are all so proud to be Members. The 1972 Act was a good Act. It was introduced by someone who I have not always praised for his goodness towards the British consumer—my right hon. Friend the Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who is not present tonight. It was his Government who, in 1972, introduced a robust measure that was supported by both sides of the House. It was intended simply to defend the interests of the British consumer. My hon. Friend the Member for Ludlow (Mr. Gill) made the important point about the significance or origin markings on foodstuffs. That could apply across the whole range of consumer goods because it would be in the interests of the British consumer. It is sad that an Act of Parliament should be swept away at an hour of night when most sensible people are drinking their Horlicks or Ovaltine and saying, "Me for bed, so goodnight, darling." The 1972 Act has been ambushed and swept away.

Above all, what is happening tonight is sad for parliamentary sovereignty. The great British public has difficulty in understanding what is meant when we say that sovereignty is being eroded. They should witness this scene tonight, when an Act of Parliament that passed through all its stages only a few years ago is obliterated from the statute book, on the nod, and without any real pressure from Europe, simply because the Government are suddenly in a genuflectory mood, willing to bow the knee and get rid of the Act before anybody can cause any trouble.

What a sadness that must be for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. In Bruges, she said:

"Europe will be stronger precisely because it has France as France, Spain as Spain, Britain as Britain, each with its own customs, traditions and identity."

She might have added, "But no longer with its own origin markings."

Something of importance is going on the nod, quietly, and, frankly, in a rather humiliating way. A piece of British sovereignty is being thrown out the window. I am sad about it, and I wish to record my protest tonight.

10.50 pm

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): I shall not detain the House for long, but one or two practical points in the legislation worry me. I expect that you will be aware, Mr. Speaker, that one growth industry is wine production, and we are rapidly becoming international experts in its development. The trouble is that we are running into a little competition from France and German wine producers. They put "Produce of France", "Bottled in France" or "Bottled in Germany" on their wine bottles. That discriminates against English wine producers who want their wine to have a fair share of the market and do not want to be discriminated against in preference to French or German producers.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister, whom I congratulate on his presence on the Government Front Bench, whether an English wine producer would be able to go to the EEC and demand that French wine producers remove the words "Produce of France" from their bottles.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): Is it not even more important that wine consumers should have some idea of where the stuff comes from? Wine from various EEC countries which most of us perhaps regard as undrinkable or wine that might possibly be regarded as French but which comes from north Africa might be discriminated against.

Mr. King: One could take that point of view, but labelling is surely a thing of the past. I am trying to establish to what extent the legislation will permeate through to everyday produce items.

I am intrigued also about what will happen when a cargo of Welsh lamb arrives in France. At the moment, lamb is clearly produce of Wales, but it will presumably become European lamb—Euro lamb. Is that another reason why the legislation is advantageous—that the French will no longer be able to stop the arrival of Welsh lamb, because there will be no such thing; it will be Euro lamb?

A more substantial matter relates to the car industry, in particular Nissan in Sunderland. One of the highlights of overseas investment in this country is Japanese involvement in much of our industry these days, be it video cassette recorders, television sets, electronics products or, in this case, cars. The difficulty arises in getting other countries to accept that such products are originally created in this country.

Presumably, under this legislation, that obstacle to our exporting cars throughout the EEC will be removed, because they will be considered Euro products. Therefore, France will not be able to stop the arrival of loads of Nissan Bluebirds, because it will no longer be valid for it to point the finger and ask where such cars originated. The cars have come from this country. There is no longer any need for them to be marked "Made in England with parts from Japan." They can simply be marked "Euro made."

Although there are some practical problems for the consumer, there are great opportunities for our wine makers, Welsh lamb, car and electronics producers to open new markets in Europe. Hitherto some markets have been closed to our products because the relevant countries were not satisfied that the goods were of United Kingdom origin.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, but hesitate to point out that he has got it all wrong. The order has no effect in the Common Market; its only effect is in this country, where it deprives the consumer of the weapons to discriminate against imports. People are increasingly resentful of the high proportion of our domestic market that is taken by imports and by the number of British firms that are being taken over by foreign firms. The order deprives people of the ability to do anything about that, and it has no effect on getting our goods accepted in Europe.

Mr. King: I am grateful for that intervention. What I am seeking to establish is the element of two-way traffic. If we are not entitled to put our country of origin on our products, it follows that, if it is to be a fair and stable market, neither can the country of origin be mentioned on products coming in from Europe. Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will enlighten us on those points.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I am sorry that I was not here at the beginning of the debate. I am also sorry that the Government lost their hundred and did not move the business motion, which is what I had expected them to do. As the annunciator in my room is not working, I was unable to be here at the beginning of the debate because there was nothing to indicate that it was starting. If the annunciators are not providing the information, they should be ripped out throughout the House.

I accept that I should have been here—there were good reasons why I was not—because the order is important to the wool textile industry, which is based in Bradford. The industry has sent me a brief and a note from the chairman and managing director of Centaur Clothes of Leeds, Mr. J. D. Jackson, who is probably a supporter of the Conservative party. WOOLTAC—Wool Textile and Clothing Industry Action Committee—is supported by both Labour and Conservative local authorities, and both have expressed their concern, which is based on reality.

That organisation, which, as I have said, is supported by both major political parties, points out its concern at the repeal of the Trade Descriptions Act 1972, by stating:

"This Act is being repealed because the European Commission have initiated infraction proceedings against it, and the Government believe it could not be successfully defended in the European Court."

I am sorry that I missed the Minister's opening words, but I wonder why the Government did not try to act in the European Court and why they have given up before they have even got there. That suggests a different spirit from the view expressed by the Prime Minister in her Bruges speech. If the Prime Minister was expressing the view that the Common Market is becoming too federal and that we should stand up to it, surely the Government should be using all the machinery that is available to them.

The replacement legislation in the form of an order under the Trade Descriptions Act, the Trade Descriptions (Place of Production) (Marking) Order, is not as effective as the original legislation. Indeed, it is so soggy that the letter sent to me states:

"Former Industry and Consumer Affairs Minister John Butcher gave a commitment to WOOLTAC earlier this year that more detailed guidance would be provided as to what constitutes a misleading presentation of goods under the new Order."

Perhaps the Minister outlined the detailed guidance, but he will no doubt refer to it when he replies to the debate. I shall examine Hansard in great detail when it is published tomorrow. It is important to note that the guidance does not have any legal effect. The legal application is in the order, not in the Minister's guidance. The Minister's guidance can be ignored.

The truth is that the Department of Trade and Industry is scared stiff that the European Commission will threaten to take it to court again. So it has produced a soggy, vague, unsatisfactory order and tries to appease manufacturers, many of whom support the Conservative party, by saying that the Minister's guidelines will provide a satisfactory background. The Minister knows that that is so much window dressing. His guidelines have no legal effect and can be ignored.

Mr. Cash: I am a member of the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, which the hon. Gentleman chairs.

Does he recall whether we have referred to the provisions of the order in any of our reports, and especially to the fact that this is a "Henry VIII" type of clause?

Mr. Cryer: Many statutory instruments are published with a great deal of guidance. The Committee has said that statutory instruments should stand on their own and should not depend on guidance. The law is set out in the statutory instrument, and guidance—whether it is from the Department of Health or the Department of Social Security, which issue shoals of guidance documents, handbooks and leaflets, or from the Department of Trade and Industry—should not be relied upon.

The Prime Minister says that the Common Market is becoming stronger. She disagrees with the view of the President of the Commission that in 10 years' time 80 per cent. of legislation will emanate from the Common Market, not from state Parliaments. Yet she is allowing the erosion of legislation by the Government.

The wool textile industry has invested heavily. It is not antique. The textile and clothing industry is one of the largest employers in the country, employing more than 500,000 people, and is of vital importance to the economy. The industry, certainly in Yorkshire, is worried about the erosion of jobs by imports and about the fact that consumers will not now be able to make a fair judgment. If they wish to buy cloth made in Japan, West Germany or the Prato region of Italy, which is still producing subsidised woollen products because it can get round the social security provisions, thus producing a 10 per cent. price advantage—it has been investigated by the Commission, but with no positive result in terms of equality of competition—people should have that information of origin. But they are denied it because the Government have yielded to the Commission, which does not want a group of countries to work together. It wants a complete Euro blur, and that is what this order is about.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): The hon. Gentleman suggests that the wool textile industry is worried about the order, but the brief that he received says:

"Overall WOOLTAC feel the Government have pressed the European Commission hard to achieve protection as near as possible to that available under the 1972 Act."

Furthermore, having attended many meetings of WOOLTAC, which is supported by trade unions, the Labour party, Conservative authorities and employers, I must tell the hon. Gentleman that although there is anxiety about imports—especially unfair imports—there is a strong feeling that the new regime being introduced to replace the 1972 Act will be sufficient protection for jobs in the textile industry in west Yorkshire.

Mr. Cryer: The hon. Gentleman omitted to mention the four points of qualification in the briefing which follow that. First, WOOLTAC wants the approval of the Consumer Protection Act 1987 (Commencement No. 2) Order 1988 to move in parallel with approval, through the affirmative resolution procedure of the Trades Descriptions (Place of Production) (Marking) Order, to ensure no gap in protection. Secondly, WOOLTAC emphasises the desirability of a European Communitywide scheme of origin marking for imports to the EC. The Minister has been "sounding out" member states on that and we would expect him to make a statement of the results. Thirdly, WOOLTAC emphasises the need for adequate resources for effective enforcement of the new order, and the fourth part relates to the point I mentioned earlier about the former Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs. WOOLTAC has enumerated those four important qualifications. In his "sounding out", has the Minister received an assurance from Italy that subsidised exports to this country from the Prato region will stop? He may receive assurances, but they are not put into effect.

As the hon. Member for Keighley (Mr. Waller) knows, the industry has been pressing the Department to do something about imports of Turkish acrylic fibre yarn, which have shot up to more than 4,000 tonnes from virtually nothing. The Government cannot take any action themselves, but must go to the Commission. The Commission wants to see greater damage to the industry before it will begin to take action, and that means either more unemployment or short-time working. The power to apply criteria for fair competition has gone from the Government, whatever the Prime Minister may say in her speeches in Bruges and elsewhere. It has shifted to the Commission, whose priority is not the United Kingdom textile industry or other United Kingdom industries which manufacture goods for sale, but the complete harmonisation of every standard it can lay its hands on inside the Common Market. It has been unsuccessful, as I showed with textiles in the Prato region of Italy, and there are many other examples which, unfortunately, I have not time to go into now.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that on 25 February 1972 the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley)—now the right hon. Member, which shows that selling people short pays off—agreed that this would never happen? Now it has happened. How many more times will we be promised that these things will not be changed, which in time will be changed?

Mr. Cryer: I shall conclude my remarks because I want to give the Minister a chance to make a few closing comments.

We are in great difficulty. The hon. Member for Keighley may say that WOOLTAC has been prepared to compromise and to say that it hopes that the new regime will be as good as the old one, but the reality is that it is unlikely to be so. The old Department of Trade had a strong element of Euro-fanaticism and made compromise after compromise to the Common Market. That was when I was a Minister in that Department, and no doubt it has done so ever since, so I am worried.

The wool textile industry has invested and is a modern industry. The workers have accepted all sorts of changes in working practices. They work 24-hour shifts and have accepted new machinery which covers a much wider range of output. Productivity has increased. Yet there has been a continuing erosion of jobs ever since 1970. Under the last Labour Government there was an increase in employment in the wool textile industry in 1978, but since that high point it has declined.

A passage in the action committee's letter reads:

"I write requesting your help concerning the provision of adequate origin-marking legislation, which as you may know has been of concern to the Wool Textile and Clothing Industry Action Committee for some time now."

I fear that the cause for that concern will rear its head again. We are seeing another example of the Government's power to act being eroded by the Commission, and it will be followed by further examples that will further erode the rights of the elected Government of the day. I happen to disagree with the elected Government of the day, but they were elected and they have certain responsibilities to undertake. Their powers to act, however, are being eroded by the Common Market.

The erosion will continue until we repeal section 2 of the European Communities Act 1972. If that is not done, we shall continue to be confronted with orders of this sort. The Government's room for action is being limited by non-elected appointed commissioners, who put the interests of some vague, shadowy and amorphous notion of a United States of Western Europe before the interests of the workers of the individual states and their employers.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Orders of this sort come before the House week after week, month after month. They will come before the House year after year. We have been promised by one Minister after another—it does not matter which party is in office, and that is one of the tragedies—that no contravention will be made without the authority of the House. However, we continue to approve orders and, as Mr. Delors said, 82 per cent.—[HON. MEMBERS: "80 per cent."] Does it matter whether it is 80 per cent. or 90 per cent? Mr. Delors has said that in due course 80 per cent. of our laws will be enacted as a result of what happens in Brussels.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The hon. Gentleman was the Eurofanatic who sat outside the House. If Jacques Delors came into the House now, he would wipe his shoes for him. He would grovel at his feet, as he has always done.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: Like the TUC did.

Mr. Skinner: Absolutely right. If I had been at the TUC, Jacques Delors would not have received a standing ovation from me. Over the past decade, and for longer than that, too many have grovelled to the Common Market and the commissioners, such as Jacques Delors. There are still a few members of the Labour party—Socialists—who will never surrender to people like Jacques Delors. We should remember that the country that is making all the money in the Common Market is West Germany. It has a balance of payments surplus this year of $40 billion equivalent. Britain has a deficit of $13 billion equivalent. By God, there are some who say that Germany lost the war. The Prime Minister and all the rest of them have helped West Germany on its way.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: It would have been better if the hon. Gentleman had made his brave speech at the Labour party conference instead of making it here.

Mr. Skinner: That is exactly what I did.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: It did not sound as brave then as it does at this hour of the night.

The point is—[Interruption.] Has the hon. Gentleman finished?

Mr. Skinner: I am not like the hon. Gentleman, who is a Eurofanatic.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: The most important consideration is where we shall finish. As hon. Members have said, my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry used to sit proudly on these Benches and fight for this country, but what we have heard——

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): My hon. Friend was not here; he did not hear it.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: With respect, I have heard it so often——

Mr. Harris: My hon. Friend did not hear it.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I have heard these brave speeches so often. People who sit on these Benches and then transfer to the Government Front Bench tell us why it is not possible. But in the end all the people of this country must decide where they stand. Do they stand for this country or for Europe? Surely we were elected to this Parliament to represent our people. Under regulation after regulation, this House is given solemn assurances that there will be no contravention of our rights, yet contraventions march on and on. Where will it end? It will end with this Parliament being a subsidiary of the Parliament in Brussels.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: From this Dispatch Box I have given the hon. Gentleman the opportunity to put his vote where his mouth is and to demonstrate to the Government what he thinks about this legislation. It is largely up to him.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: The Labour party always says that it is up to other people, not itself. I have not voted for similar European legislation year after year, and I will not vote for this legislation tonight.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Or against it.

Mr. Beaumont-Dark: I am prepared to vote against it if the Opposition will put the Whips on. I believe that many of us would be prepared to do so. It is time to say that we are not prepared to accept one assurance after another that this country should be run from anywhere but Westminster. If the Opposition will put the Whips on, I shall vote against the order.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): I shall not detain the House for very long tonight. My remarks will be in the form of a question to the Minister, which I ask him to answer in his concluding remarks.

On balance, I regret the disappearance of origin marking as enshrined in the Consumer Protection Act 1972. Nevertheless, I recognise that, if we are moving towards a single European market and if that single market is to mean anything at all, we must have one domestic market. Therefore, it does not make too much sense to distinguish between different origins within the Community, and it would not make much technical sense either. Given the immense amount of integrated manufacturing, subcontracting and consortium manufacturing that takes place within the European Community, origin marking by individual countries within the Community probably would not make too much semantic sense. Nevertheless, those considerations do not apply to goods imported into the Community from outside.

The Minister referred to the representations—which I know that he has received—from a number of industrial groups which are in favour of introducing some form of Community origin marking. There are various ways in which that can be organised, and I shall not detain the House by describing them in detail. My hon. Friend did say, however, that he was a little pessimistic about the chances of persuading his Community colleagues to accept a solution along those lines, and that he envisaged a number of difficulties. The Minister did not say what those difficulties were, but a number of people who will be listening to the debate, both inside and outside the House, will be interested to have his assessment of them. I should be grateful if he would enumerate them, at least briefly, and give us some confidence that he will not abandon the attempt to persuade his Community colleagues to move in that direction.

Mr. Forth: This has been a revealing debate, not just because of the tributes that have been paid to me, for which I am grateful and which I accept with traditional humility from the Dispatch Box, but because of the attitudes and motives displayed by those who have questioned some of the elements of the order.

The expressions and words used by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) and by my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) were especially interesting. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby based much of his argument on people's right to discriminate. I always thought that Opposition Members were rather wary of discrimination and were against it. When it comes to this matter, however, they are in favour of it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East based much of his argument on the right of people to exercise their prejudices. I am sure that my hon. Friend is one of least prejudiced of men, yet he based his argument on some sort of god-given right of consumers or housewives to exercise a degree of prejudice, or, as the hon. Member for Great Grimsby has said, discrimination, when distinguishing between goods originating from different countries of the Community.

Many references have been made to the Prime Minister and her stated views adumbrated at Bruges. I remind the House that one of the things that my right hon. Friend emphasised over and over again was her belief in the importance of a genuinely free market in the Community. She also emphasised the importance of a market that would be as open as possible to non-Community imports. Therefore, we do not believe in a "fortress Europe" approach. The order is at one with that desire as it attempts to improve the possibilities for the freest movement of goods within the Community without prejudice or discrimination. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East and the hon. Member for Great Grimsby will concede that that is an important element of the Community's aims. It is also what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister wants to see happen in the Community.

I made it clear that, at present, there is no universal origin marking requirement even under the terms of the Trade Descriptions Act 1972, which has been much praised by hon. Members. That Act requires imported goods to be origin marked only if they bear a United Kingdom name or mark. Many of the implications that have been made tonight are not true, even within the terms of the 1972 Act.

Much play has been made of the belief that what is going on here is unparliamentary and undemocratic and that this is some sort of sordid measure being rushed through late at night. My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, South (Mr. Aitken) made such claims. The origins of the order, however, were contained within the provisions of the Consumer Protection Act 1987, which went through this House in the proper, full parliamentary manner. It was debated and democratically dealt with. The order is simply the culmination of what was set in place by the Act. To suggest that something unparliamentary is happening is ridiculous. The order has been given a generous amount of parliamentary time and many hon. Members have been able to make valuable contributions. The order has received the full examination of the House and, if it is approved tonight, it will have received proper parliamentary scrutiny.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: In 1987 the Consumer Protection Bill was rushed through a few days before the House was dissolved. It got a bipartisan reception because the Government then undertook that they would introduce effective control over origin marking. They have not done so and, therefore, the pretence on which that reception was based has been removed.

Mr. Forth: I am delighted by the hon. Gentleman's endorsement of the 1987 Act, which he said had bipartisan support, because it contains the provisions for the repeal of the Trade Descriptions Act 1972.

Mr. Cash: The provisions in the Consumer Credit Act 1974 which gave rise to the power to repeal this under the order were themselves contained in a European Community directive. That is the origin of the appeal.

Mr. Forth: As always, I defer to the knowledge of my hon. Friend in these matters. His knowledge of them is almost unparalleled in the House, and I am grateful for his guidance.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) asked whether wines and lamb could be labelled with their countries of origin. The answer is yes. Producers are free to identify the country of origin of their products if they think that is to their benefit. Nothing in the order will prevent British manufacturers or producers from proudly proclaiming that their products are British——

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Vauxhall?

Mr. Forth: I am not sure why the hon. Gentleman shouts that at me. He is probably saying that we must not confuse this order with the much discussed matter of contents and origin, particularly of vehicles. The definition of origin for that purpose is contained in section 36 of the Trade Descriptions Act 1968—I am sure the hon. Member for Great Grimsby is well aware of this—which defines the country of origin as where the goods

"last underwent a treatment or process resulting in a substantial change."

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Northfield is well acquainted with that definition. He and many others still struggle with it; it continues to pose difficulties. But it has nothing to do with this order. I mention it only to clarify that and to remind hon. Members that the order is different.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) made some uncharacteristically inaccurate remarks. He knows as well as I do that as soon as this country joined the European Community in 1973 we acknowledged the role of the Commission in Brussels in policing the measures passed by the other bodies in the Community. We also acknowledged the European Court of Justice as the ultimate arbiter of the relevance and validity of Community measures. Tonight, we acknowledge that again. As a member of the Community we acknowledge the role of the Commission. The hon. Member for Bradford, South has the great distinction of holding a dual mandate as a Member of this place and as a Member of the European Parliament in Strasbourg. Surely he would not deny the legitimate role of the European Court of Justice or the Commission. He is an elected member of the third great body of the Community and it would be remiss of him to deny the roles of the other two.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) made the relevant point that, given the degree of integrated manufacturing—Vauxhall may be a case in point—in the European Community these days, origin marking intra Community countries is probably irrelevant. It becomes even less relevant with increased integration. We are now going to try to persuade our colleagues in the Community to set about deciding on a workable origin marking regime that will apply to countries outside the Community.

This order essentially applies to the movement of goods inside the Community; the Government and the Prime Minister are committed to that. We shall strive—I have already initiated the process—to bring the Community together to devise the means of dealing with goods from outside the Community——

Mr. Teddy Taylor: We know what the order is about. Is my hon. Friend saying that he wants a regime that will enable consumers to know whether goods have been made in Japan but not whether they have been made in Germany?

Mr. Forth: What I am saying implies that. If the order is approved, I have undertaken to work with our Community partners to devise a regime that will go some way to meeting my hon. Friend's request. I have already initiated that process.

I have tried to satisfy hon. Members with answers. I commend the order to the House.

Girobank

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

11.40 pm

Mr. Allan Roberts (Bootle): First, I thank the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster for coming to reply to this Adjournment debate. However, a statement should have been made to the House about the privatisation of Girobank before now. It should not have taken an Adjournment debate to bring the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster here. There should have been a debate in Government time on the Government's proposal—a major privatisation proposal—affecting the 6,000 people who work for Girobank and all those who work in sub-post offices throughout the country which are mostly dependent on Girobank for their business. It also affects pensioners, the unemployed and everyone who receives cheques from Girobank. It is a major privatisation that does not need legislation. Therefore, the Government should report to Parliament on a regular basis, explain what is happening and enable debates on their proposals to take place.

Girobank is very successful. Since 1968, when it was established by a Labour Government, Girobank has grown into a successful banking arm of the Post Office. It now has about 2·5 million customers, and in 1986-87 it made a profit before tax of £23·1 million. It is a successful financial institution in the public sector. As I have already said, it employs 6,000 people—5,500 in my constituency.

Most EEC countries have a public sector Girobank. It provides competition in those countries in the same way as it does in Britain, where it offers customers a real alternative to the major clearing banks, and it has enhanced competition. As well as creating jobs on Merseyside and keeping the local community alive, Girobank has created jobs in Edinburgh, Leeds, Ashford in Kent, Birmingham, Bristol, Belfast and London. Girobank pioneered free banking and brought banking to the doorsteps of many rural areas about which many Conservative Members are concerned.

Labour Members see no reason why Girobank should be privatised and why the Government should have made the proposal to sell off Girobank in the first place. It will not increase or enhance competition, and the way in which it is being done will not extend share ownership in any way whatsoever. If it is kept in public ownership and further developed, competition will continue.

However, in June the Secretary of State for Health, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), when he held the post of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster announced that Girobank would be privatised—for doctrinaire reasons, presumably, as there were no other grounds—that it would not be a flotation, but that it would go out to tender, and certain conditions were set down. On 7 June, the Minister said that Girobank was a successful bank

"with a particular strength in money transmissions and handling deposits of corporate cash."

He said,

"Girobank . . . needs to expand vigorously".

Indeed, it is in the process of doing so in the public sector. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the Post Office had agreed with the Government to privatise Girobank and that Girobank would be offered for sale to a financial institution or other suitable company. He said that suitable bidders for the bank would be given the opportunity to tender, and that has happened. He said that in deciding on a buyer the price would be a major consideration in order to ensure a fair deal for the taxpayer. The figure of £200 million was in the Government's mind. He also said:

"weight should be given to . . . a purchaser who will widen choice"—

that is important—

"for the general public in banking services."

He also said that the purchaser should be

"capable of developing and expanding Girobank's business."

He said that the close links between Girobank and Post Office Counters would be safeguarded and that

"prospective purchasers will be invited to propose arrangements to enable management and employees to share . . . in the future success of the business."—[Official Report, 7 June 1988, Vol. 134, c. 713.]

The right hon. and learned Gentleman said that the purchaser would have to satisfy the strict requirements of the Bank of England, and the Government went on to rule out a management buy-out or a consortium bid.

The Government employed a company of merchant bankers, Schroder, to deal with the matter. The right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe, then the Minister responsible, wrote to me on 27 June saying that he hoped the sale would be completed before the end of the year. An expected timetable was submitted to all those who expressed an interest in purchasing Girobank which gave the end of September as the deadline for round two bids. The Minister, and a letter I received from the Prime Minister, made it clear that a shortlist would be produced and announced during the recess and that in November the Government hoped to announce the successful bidder.

Although the unions were opposed to privatisation, they met and decided not to take industrial action but to seek some safeguards from the Government about the procedures involved in the sale. They behaved very responsibly. They produced an eight-point plan. They wanted continued investment commitment to the bank; a commitment to the growth of the bank, especially among corporate customers; protection of the bank as an entity and the protection of Bootle as the major operational centre.

If privatisation threatens the centre in Bootle, the entire area will be devastated. It is an area of high unemployment where Girobank, the flagship of public enterprise at work, is one of the major employers. The unions also wanted the siting of the contingency centre in close proximity to the Bootle centre. The proposal is that it should go ahead in Wigan. We hope that that will be safeguarded. The unions wanted protection of the commercial relationship between Post Office Counters and the bank; protection of conditions of service such as pension rights and continued trade union recognition. They wanted staff involvement in the development of the bank. Those are all reasonable requests made by the work force and those involved in making Girobank such a success.

Since the statement in the House and since Girobank was put out to public tender we have heard nothing from the Government except rumour, speculation and leaks from Schroder and the Department of Trade and Industry. Despite the fact that I have asked questions in the House and that my hon. Friends have tabled questions for written answer, the Government have not told us what has happened. We have passed the deadline that the Government originally laid down for the publication of the shortlist. We were told that it would be published in November and that the unions and the work force would have an opportunity to have discussions with those wishing to purchase. We have heard rumours that Westpac, the Australian company, and the Bank of Scotland have withdrawn their bids and that the bids were well below £200 million. The shortlist that the Government hoped to publish was depleted to such an extent that they could not publish it. There were insufficient bidders for Girobank and the Government faced the dilemma of whether to go ahead with the privatisation.

[Mr. Allan Roberts]

That is authoritative speculation that has appeared in the press over the past two weeks and no Minister has denied it. The Department of Trade and Industry suggested that there never was a deadline so one could not be expected. The Government hoped that a deadline would be met and a timetable was sent out by Schroder. The Government's proposals for Girobank have not stayed on course. I hope that the Government will be able to answer my questions because I am concerned about the future of Girobank and its employees. The current uncertainty must be brought to an end.

The Labour party and the majority of the work force at Girobank are completely opposed to privatisation. The employees are aware that if privatisation goes ahead their future will be at risk, and they are aware of the risks of asset-stripping. Girobank is competitive and successful in the public sector, but my main concern is for Girobank, whether or not it stays in public ownership.

Why have not Parliament or Girobank's employees been told of the shortlist of bidders? Why have the Government relaxed the conditions governing the sale of Girobank? I hope that the Minister will say that the Government have not relaxed the conditions and that they want to ensure a secure future for the bank. Will the Government still insist on a sale price of about £200 million, or will they sell it at a knock-down price? In that regard, we have had the Royal Ordnance fiasco and the BP sale. In many instances, asset-stripping has resulted as a consequence of privatisation and the taxpayer has suffered.

It is feared that if someone buys Girobank at a knock-down price the business will be asset-stripped and sold at its true price. If a second sale took place shortly after the first, the conditions and guarantees that the Government have given may be lost. If it is sold at a knock-down price, those concerned about the interests of the taxpayer and those concerned about the future of Girobank will be angry because the centre of Bootle may disappear.

Is a management or part-management buy-out ruled out by the Government? Will a consortium bid be allowed? The Government implied, if not stated categorically, that that would be ruled out. Are the Government still excluding bids from British clearing banks or the larger building societies? If a bank with a clearing house facility or a large building society buys Girobank it would be more likely to run down the centre of Bootle. It would also be more likely to asset-strip Girobank, because it would have the same facilities and would be buying it to get its customers, its business and the Post Office outlets or to buy out the competition, about which we are very worried.

Have the Government abandoned their commitment to more customer choice in the market? They said that that was one of the purposes of privatisation. If a major clearing bank or building society purchases Girobank, that will not happen.

What has been the response so far by way of Girobank bids? Will the Minister come clean and answer that question? If a satisfactory buyer is not found or if an acceptable bid is not submitted, will the Government withdraw their proposals for privatisation? Any other reasonable vendor—a householder putting a house up for sale or somebody selling a business—would take the view that if the asking price cannot be realised, the house or business should be withdrawn from the market, rather than leave it there with all the insecurity and uncertainty that must result.

What is the Government's timetable for the sale of Girobank, if the sale is to go ahead? As I said, I am totally opposed to its privatisation and hope that the Government will not proceed with the sale. But if they are intent on going ahead, I hope that they will guarantee to all concerned that Girobank will be maintained as a viable business with a successful future.

11.57 pm

Mr. Roger Stott (Wigan) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. Does the hon. Gentleman have the consent of the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Rogers) and the Minister to take part in the debate?

Mr. Stott: Yes, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Very well.

Mr. Stott: I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) on raising this important issue. I must record, speaking from the Opposition Front Bench, that this is a most unsatisfactory procedure by which the House may have an opportunity at least to debate this issue—in a few minutes—on a Thursday at just before midnight. After all, we are discussing the employment prospects of 6,000 people in Bootle and elsewhere and an important banking institution. This is a most unsatisfactory way of dealing with this important subject.

My hon. Friend raised many issues that are worrying Labour Members and those employed in Girobank, and, I suspect, millions of customers, of whom I am one, of the bank. We want to know what is to happen to the bank with which we have banked since it came into existence. My hon. Friend posed reasonable questions. So far, we have not received satisfactory replies to the letters we have written, to the parliamentary questions we have tabled or to other forms of probing in which we have indulged.

My hon. Friend pointed out that the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), the Minister's predecessor, made a statement in the House last June about the Government's intentions towards Girobank. I understood that on that occasion he laid down the parameters governing the way in which the bank would be sold. They were drawn in such a way as to exclude the major clearing banks from bidding, to avoid any problem with the Monopolies and Mergers Commission, and I could appreciate that.

Since then, the only information that I and my hon. Friend—and he represents the town of Bootle and those who work in Girobank there—have received is from the newspapers. We read almost daily that the Government are in real trouble over the sale because nobody wants to buy it.

My hon. Friend referred to Westpac. It has pulled out, as has the Royal Bank of Scotland. If such organisations are not showing interest in purchasing Girobank, what prospective purchasers are there? Which organisations are bidding? Is the Minister beginning to move the goal posts, as it were, from where his right hon. and learned Friend put them in June of this year? According to The Independent, the Government are considering entertaining a bid from the Co-operative bank and Unity Trust or a management buy-out. If that is the case, the parameters that his right hon. and learned Friend laid down in June certainly have been shifted.

The Minister is an honourable man and he must come clean on this matter. The House, the people and especially the employees of Girobank have to know whether the ground is changing. We believe that it is, for the simple reason that when the Minister's right hon. and learned Friend came to the House in June we told him that it was a bad idea. We opposed the privatisation of Girobank on ideological grounds. We also said that it was the wrong time to do it. The bank was just about to break into the new era of financial services. I think that we will be proved right. The bidders for Girobank are virtually non-existent.

It is an insult to the House that it must deal with a matter of such importance at this time of night during an Adjournment debate. My hon. Friend the Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) and I met the unions from Girobank earlier this evening. The vast majority of those who work in Girobank are employees of the Post Office, and have been for 20, 25 or even 28 years. Their pension provisions are locked into the Post Office pension arrangements. As I understand it, once the bank is sold those pension arrangements will run for only a further 10 months. They will then, under this new liberated Government scheme, have to find other ways to fund their pension scheme. That is disgraceful. Five thousand people who were employed by the Post Office three or four months ago have now been told, following an arbitrary decision by the Government, that their pensions are in jeopardy. If the Minister thinks that they will accept that with equanimity, he is wrong.

My hon. Friend and I have posed a number of questions that the Minister must answer.

12.2 am

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Tony Newton): In the nine minutes remaining to me I shall do my best to respond to the many questions that have been posed. I hope that Opposition Members will understand if the pressure of time makes it difficult to respond as fully as I would have wished.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) on obtaining this Adjournment debate, but resist the suggestion that as Cabinet Minister responsible for this matter, coming to the House to answer an Adjournment debate raised by the Member of Parliament with the most direct interest because his constituents are affected, constitutes an abuse of the House. It constitutes an entirely proper response—[Interruption.] I was picking up the comments of the hon. Member for Wigan (Mr. Stott), rather than anything that the hon. Member for Bootle said.

I thank the hon. Member for Bootle for his courtesy in letting me know in advance the specific questions that he would ask, to which I shall reply. I had intended to say a word about the history of the Girobank and about the Government's general attitude towards privatisation. The House is certainly familiar with the latter, and the history was touched on by the hon. Gentleman.

It was against the history of Girobank and the privatisation policy that the Government have successfully pursued in many areas of industry and commerce that we considered the position of Girobank. As the hon. Gentleman said—there is no dispute between us on this—it has been successful in advancing its business. However, the banking market is rapidly changing and is extremely competitive, and we concluded that if Girobank was to achieve its full potential, to sustain its success, and to grow further, it would need to match its competitors in the freedom and flexibility with which it could respond to changing circumstances and new opportunities. It has to be free from the inevitable constraints that go with being a public sector undertaking, for which Ministers are answerable in the ways familiar to the House. Thus, on 7 June the then Chancellor of the Duchy, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), informed the House that the Government and the Post Office had agreed to offer Girobank for sale to a financial institution or other suitable company.

The announcement of the proposed sale generated a wide response, with many inquiries, and on 25 July a confidential information memorandum was sent to those who had registered interest. To protect the future interests of the bank and the taxpayer, the Government and the Post Office Board outlined certain factors of which account was to be taken in evaluating bids. They covered price, acceptability to the Bank of England, the prospect of widening choice for the general public in banking services, the importance of the link between Girobank and Post Office Counters Ltd., capability to develop and expand Girobank's business, and arrangements to enable management and employees to share directly in the future success of the business. Those who expressed an interest in buying the bank were informed that the Government and the Post Office Board would also be concerned—I ask the hon. Member for Wigan to take note of this—to ensure that proper regard was paid to the interests of the employees.

When bids were sought, it was indicated that they should be submitted by the end of October. The current position—this answers some questions—is that the Post Office has informed me that the sale of Girobank by tender has not produced, within the hoped-for time scale, a buyer able to meet the requirements set for the sale. However, it remains the case that the Government and the Post Office Board are committed to transferring Girobank to the private sector through the sale of the bank to a suitable purchaser. Therefore, the Post Office and the financial advisers for the sale are holding further confidential discussions with potential purchasers, taking into account the factors set out by my right hon. and learned Friend the

[Mr. Tony Newton]

Member for Rushcliffe in his statement on 7 June. This process is likely to take some time. I will, of course, continue to keep the House informed.

Before coming to the other questions raised by the hon. Member, it may be helpful if I say something about the factors that we think have contributed to the position I have described.

Although it provides all the services that a modern bank provides, Girobank has a number of distinctive features. It uses the 20,000 or so outlets of Post Office Counters Ltd. Counters are open six days a week, and over longer hours, compared with high street banks. On the other hand, the staff are not employed by Girobank, as the hon. Gentleman said, and provide services to others in addition to Girobank. Over the past three years—another factor to be borne in mind—Girobank has further developed a distinctive telephone and mail banking system.

Having given the matter careful consideration, we now think that for selling a specialised bank like Girobank the time scale indicated in July was too demanding and may not have allowed prospective bidders adequate time for assessing and understanding the special features of Girobank, the potential to which those features give rise, and how that potential might fit their future strategy. For that reason, we considered it right to allow more time.

Let me now refer—I hope fully—to the specific questions of the hon. Member for Bootle to which I have not yet responded. He asked why we had not published the names of shortlisted bidders. The simple fact is that several bidders asked that their bids should be regarded as entirely confidential unless they were selected as the purchaser. They are entitled to ask that, and, in my view, entitled to have their wishes respected. In those circumstances, the Post Office Board is not in a position to release any names.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about what he described as a "relaxation of the conditions" of the statement of 7 June. My right hon. and learned Friend said those factors would be taken into account in evaluating bids. As I have said, those same factors will continue to be taken into account in the further confidential discussions with potential purchasers.

I was also asked about the price. That is one of the factors which the Post Office has set which will be taken into account. The sale is by tender, and no fixed price is, or was, set in advance. There has never been any question of insisting on a particular price. The point is that we must be satisfied that it represents an acceptable deal for the taxpayer.

I have been asked whether a bid from a clearing bank or a large building society would be acceptable. As my right hon. and learned Friend said on 7 June, no one is ruled out from putting in a bid. We would judge a bid from a clearing bank or a large building society in the light of the same factors as a bid from anyone else.

I have also been asked the same question in respect of a management buy-out. As I have said, no proposal is ruled out, but we doubt whether a management buy-out would be likely to satisfy the factors set out by my right hon. and learned Friend. A bid from a consortium is certainly not ruled out just because it is made by a consortium. It would be judged on its merits.

The Government remain convinced that the bank would benefit from the freer and more competitive environment of the private sector. Both we and the Post Office Board remain committed to transferring Girobank to the private sector through the sale of the bank to a suitable purchaser. Although the objective has not been secured as quickly as we had earlier hoped, we are continuing to work with the Post Office Board to achieve it, because we believe that it is in the interests of the bank and those who work in it that we should.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nine minutes past Twelve o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Marden (Cross-Channel Link)

9.34 am

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone): I beg leave to present a petition signed by 567 inhabitants of the village of Marden, which is in my constituency.

British Rail is proposing to build a high-speed rail link from the Channel tunnel across Kent, and three of the proposed routes cross in or near my constituency. The village of Marden is immediately affected by route 3. Route 3 crosses virgin countryside where there has hitherto been no railway, whereas the other routes do not.

And the prayer of the petition reads:

Wherefore your Petitioners pray that your Honourable House urge British Rail to respect the wishes of those living in the affected area of Kent that no new railway line shall be built across the Weald.

To lie upon the Table.

Interpretation

6. In this Order 'the Bills' means the School Boards (Scotland) Bill and the Housing Bill.

During the debate on the motion to allocate time for the Local Government Finance Bill on 22 February the right hon. Member for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Foot), who is always the doyen of these occasions, urged me to take no more timetable motions before 20 July—the anniversary of his memorable day of timetable debates. He believed that guillotines could best be defended if they came near the end of a Session, to prevent Bills from being lost. I hope that the fact that this motion is moved almost four months after that date and just two days before the end of the Session will secure the right hon. Gentleman's approval.

The purpose of the motion is fundamental to the operation of this place. One of the principles underlying our work is that finally, however hotly contested any piece of legislation may be, the elected Government are entitled to get their business. But the use of a timetable motion to ensure that needs to be balanced against another basic requirement: that the Opposition have certain rights, among them sufficient opportunity to develop their case against the Government's proposals. In the case of each of these two Bills there can be no doubt that the Opposition have had their opportunity, and that the House has rejected their arguments.

The School Boards (Scotland) Bill received a Second Reading by a substantial majority on 12 April after a full day's debate. It was then considered in Committee for 14 sittings, and was discussed on the Floor of the House for a further full day on Report and Third Reading. The amount of time provided for it was agreed by all parties in the House.

The time available for consideration of the Housing Bill was, as the House will recall, more controversial. On the third day of Report stage, on 14 June, the Opposition undertook that if the House debated the Bill throughout that night the Bill would be completed on the 15th. That undertaking was not fulfilled. With negotiation and good will we were nevertheless able to agree that a further day should be available for remaining stages, making four parliamentary but five calendar days in all. Despite what the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Miss Primarolo) said on Wednesday, we did not seek to timetable the Bill but proceeded by agreement—ultimately—as to the amount of time needed. Indeed, the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), thanked me for the time we had provided. Before the Bill left this place it had already received more than 175 hours of debate; it received a further 64 hours' consideration in another place.

Furthermore, neither Bill has had a disrupted passage through the other place. Of the 21 amendments made there to the School Boards (Scotland) Bill, four are technical, two are minor drafting amendments, 14 are concessions to points made by Opposition Peers and the remaining one is uncontroversial. While there are significantly more amendments to the Housing Bill—some 270—the vast majority are technical and drafting matters, with perhaps only about 30 dealing with matters of substance.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): I am grateful to the Minister for giving way at this point because it will help to clear up a matter of fact to which I may wish to allude if I catch Mr. Speaker's eye. Is it not a fact that, if the Leader of the House had so wished, we could have debated on Wednesday those 270 or 30 substantive changes for another nine hours, that he could have reported progress at about lunchtime, that no disruption to any other business would have occurred and that this morning we could have been discussing the problem of homelessness? Is that not a parliamentary and factual account of what could have happened?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. If we had continued at the rate of progress that we had made up to the point when we adjourned, we should have lost both Thursday's and Friday's business and still would not have got the Bill. I shall make that clear in a minute.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The Leader of the House argues that the Government have only so much time within which to pass their legislation and that therefore they have to introduce a guillotine, even though they have a majority over the Labour party of about 150. If the Government are short of parliamentary time, why did they allow the introduction of private Bills such as the North Killingholme Cargo Terminal Bill and the Associated British Ports (No. 2) Bill to which they allocated countless hours, with the Prime Minister trotting through the Lobby, and why did they organise two-line Whips? They could have used some of that time to discuss this Bill, but rather than do so they gave way to South African coal imports.

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that the question of which private Bills are brought before the House is a matter not for me but for the Chairman of Ways and Means. The hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong. I am complaining not about the shortage of parliamentary time but about the way in which the adequate amount of parliamentary time has been used by the hon. Gentleman and his colleagues.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I am grateful to the Leader of the House for referring to what is left to debate—30 groups containing matters of substance across the whole range of questions that are dealt with in the Housing Bill. Does he concede that in no circumstances is it ideal that those matters, some of which were introduced for the first time in the other place, should be debated at the end of the parliamentary year, particularly since the Secretary of State for the Environment has introduced a completely new Bill that has taken up the time of the House, during which we could have dealt with this Bill, many of whose subjects remain undebated in this place?

Mr. Wakeham: Of course it is not ideal to have a timetable motion, but a substantial amount of time has already been devoted to the Bill. Some of that time has not been used effectively, and something must be done about it. All Governments and Parliaments get into this classic situation at some stage and decisions have to be made. I am putting forward proposals to resolve the mater which will be best for all concerned. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support me.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House is very kind. This side of the House takes the view that the introduction of timetable motions is a great kindness to the Opposition, given the devastating by-election result last night in Govan and their need to look after and foster their constituencies.

Mr. Wakeham: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind words. I wondered how long the debate would continue before Govan was mentioned. A period of silent contemplation is more appropriate in certain quarters than discussion of that matter.

I was dealing with the question of the—[Interruption.] May I welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) to the House. I was dealing with the question of the amendments to the Housing Bill, of which 30 deal with matters of substance. Of these, well over half are items which the Opposition have welcomed, are likely to welcome, or have tabled themselves. All the Government amendments to this Bill in the Lords were agreed to without a Division. Thus there is no reason to think that it would not be possible to agree the amount of time for this House to consider the amendments. When I announced last week that they would be taken on 9 November, together with amendments to the School Boards (Scotland) Bill, there was not a word of complaint or concern from the Opposition Front Bench or Back Benches.

Yet it is clear that by Wednesday night the arrangement between the Government and the official Opposition was not generally acceptable to the House. In eight hours of discussion, only nine of the 53 groups of amendments had been considered. If we had maintained the same rate of progress, we should have required about another 40 hours to complete consideration of the Bill. Had we continued to sit, that would have meant losing yesterday's and today's business.

Mr. Spearing: The right hon. Gentleman is wrong. Will he give way?

Mr. Wakeham: No, I shall not give way.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) rose——

Mr. Wakeham: I gave way to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on a question of fact. If he wishes to make a speech, that is not a matter for me, but if he does I shall listen with interest to what he has to say.

Mr. Allen rose——

Mr. Wakeham: It seemed to me that the best way to proceed in an orderly fashion was to adjourn our consideration and bring forward this motion today. [Interruption.] I do not believe that facts are a matter for debate, as they seem to be with the Opposition. Facts are stated and then one can debate their consequences.

Mr. Allen rose——

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) will, as usual, put forward his authoritative interpretation of events, as he does on most matters.

The terms of the motion itself are intended to enable the House to make the use it thinks best of the six hours available. The motion is capable of being debated for three hours, and if the debate runs its full course a maximum of one hour would be left for consideration of the School Boards (Scotland) Bill, and a further two hours for the Housing Bill. If, however, the House spent less time discussing this motion and took the School Boards (Scotland) Bill formally, then that additional time within the total of six hours would become available for consideration of the Housing Bill where, I recognise, there is a large number of amendments outstanding. [HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] This has been done so that if the Opposition are as keen as they say they are to debate the issues relevant to the Housing Bill, they can choose to take up the extra time to do so.

At this stage of the Session, one's thoughts inevitably turn to Prorogation. This has been arranged for Tuesday 15 November and I believe it would be a major inconvenience to the House if that were altered. This being so, in order to secure our business, we need to be certain that our consideration of these Bills can be concluded today, not least because the Housing Bill is to return to another place.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): Is it not a fact that this is the first time for more years than anybody can remember that a Government have got a major Bill into such an appalling mess that they have been unable to bring it back to this House until the day before the Session ends and that it would have fallen otherwise?

Mr. Wakeham: I reject entirely the hon. Gentleman's judgment. Whether this is a precedent seems to me not to matter. Every precedent happens for the first time. [Interruption.] That is absolutely right. If the hon. Gentleman will not take that from me, I suggest that he should look at what his right hon. Friend the Member for Blaenau Gwent said:

"That is a powerful argument. . . . All precedents have been set in this manner. Therefore, precedent of itself is not a conclusive argument."—[Official Report, 14 March 1968; Vol. 760, c. 1703.]

Already we have completed almost all the ambitious legislative programme we set out to achieve in June last year. We must ensure that these two Bills are not lost. Both contain important reforms: in the case of the School Boards (Scotland) Bill, the involvement of parents in their children's education; and, in the case of the Housing Bill, measures which will go a long way towards improving the housing situation in this country. Both will substantially increase individual choice and will be widely welcomed.

I urge the House to support the motion.

9.49 am

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): The guillotine motion which the Leader of the House has just proposed is quite extraordinary, as it proposes that the House should devote to 62 pages of proposed legislation that affects the housing of more than 5 million tenants less time than most Conservative Members would expect their lawyers to devote to the buying and selling of their homes.

We have this extraordinary motion because we are in a most extraordinary situation. The Government's business managers have the benefit of a majority of 100 in the House. They have a guaranteed majority among the geriatrics in the other place. We are approaching the end of one of the longest Sessions in parliamentary history. It has gone from June 1987 to November 1988, and is laughably called a parliamentary year. Nevertheless, the Government need to guillotine two Bills on the last but one sitting day of the Session. Nothing could demonstrate more effectively the incompetence of their business managers.

This is a record bit of incompetence. This is the first parliamentary Session in history—[Interruption.] If the chairman of the 1922 Committee would like to get his bottom off his seat, I shall be happy to give way to him.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, and I hope that he will answer my question. He talks of incompetence, but where was his Chief Whip when the shambles was going on among Labour Members? They were an undisciplined rabble again.

Mr. Dobson: There was no shambles on this side of the House. Opposition Members—I do not mean only members of my party—were anxious about matters affected by the Bill and wanted to debate them properly. They wanted enough time to do that.

Mr. Skinner: So much attention was being paid to this matter the other night that even the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who normally gets home by 12 midnight, became incensed and stayed as well.

Mr. Dobson: I was quite right not to claim a monopoly of concern on this matter.

I spoke to the Clerks last night. They were reluctant to believe me when I asserted that this must be a record Session. When they checked, they confirmed that this is the first time in parliamentary history that a Government have guillotined as many as six Bills in one Session. The Government guillotined the Education Reform Bill, the poll tax Bill, the Firearms (Amendment) Bill, the Social Security Bill and now we are expected to guillotine the School Boards (Scotland) Bill and the Housing Bill. That tally is based on the strictest reckoning. There were in fact two Education Reform Bills. The first Bill was so altered by the inclusion of provisions to abolish the Inner London education authority that the Bill had to be brought back to the House and reguillotined so that the Government could get it through. We could argue, therefore, that the record is even bigger and that the Government have guillotined seven Bills in one Session.

The previous record was five, which has happened three times, but never in the extended first Session of a Parliament. That demonstrates how incompetent the Government are. They have been reduced to imposing a guillotine six times in one of the longest Sessions in history. It has been a complete mess. With all the advantages—the length of time and the size of their majority—the Government have been reduced to this. That demonstrates their incompetence, particularly the incompetence of the Leader of the House and the Government Chief Whip, who is not present.

Perhaps the latter should revert to his old title of Patronage Secretary. If what I have been told by Tory Members is true—I leave it to Conservative Members to decide whether their colleagues tell the truth—the Patronage Secretary went around last week persuading some of his flock to vote for charges for dental and optical check-ups by promising them extra money for hospitals in their constituencies. No doubt the right hon. and learned Gentleman wants to go down in history as "Porkbarrel Waddington" or "Dodgy Dave". What he was not doing, however, was organising the Government's business.

We are today being asked to impose a guillotine on the consideration of Lords amendments to two Bills. Both are obnoxious and do not have the support of the people who will be most affected by them—parents and teachers in Scotland and public and private tenants in England, Scotland and Wales. The School Boards (Scotland) Bill was described well by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) in the debate on 12 April when he urged the House to reject the Bill because it "pays only lip service to the genuine need to encourage parental involvement in Scotland's schools, will divide parents and teachers, has been rejected by educational opinion and has now been revealed as a paving measure for alien and irrelevant plans to allow schools to opt out of the public sector, which can only damage the proud and distinctive educational tradition in Scotland."—[Official Report, 12 April 1988; Vol. 131, c. 43.]

How right he was.

In view of my hon. Friend's comments, it might be reasonable to expect the Lords amendments to be obnoxious, but they are not. They are quite technical and in many cases simply correct sloppy drafting by the Government. Surely the Government do not need a guillotine to force through debates on such momentous changes as,

"delete 'one third' and insert 'one half'"

or,

"insert 'as often as appears to be necessary'", whatever that might mean. Why do they need a guillotine to get 21 such small and insignificant amendments through?

Mr. Allen: Does my hon. Friend agree that it will be extremely difficult to explain to people outside that although we had a lengthy summer recess and will not sit Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of next week, or on Monday of the following week, we are short of time in which to discuss matters of great importance to many people?

Mr. Dobson: There is something in what my hon. Friend says, but we should bear in mind what my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) said. At the behest of the Prime Minister, at the behest of the chairman of P and O no doubt, the Government decided that they were so committed to getting P and O's shoddy, bought planning permission Bill through the House that they sacrificed a whole day of Government business and then trousered the £100,000 contribution to Tory party funds which was the pay-off for their squalid arrangement. That is how part of the House's time has been used.

The Lords amendments to the Housing Bill are in a quite different category. They are not at all like the minor and limited amendments to the School Boards (Scotland) Bill. There are 273 Lords amendments to change the law on housing in England, Wales and Scotland. Those amendments have attracted 43 further Commons amendments, eight of which have been tabled by the Secretary of State himself. As far as we know, the Government originally intended those 273 amendments to be dealt with by 10 pm on Wednesday of this week. The debate started at 5.12 pm, leaving four hours 48 minutes for the debate which was less than one minute for each amendment. That was the ludicrous proposition that was put before us.

It is not as if the Bill is not important and complicated. It is extremely important and complicated and requires a great deal of time for detailed consideration. If any Conservative Members challenge that, they should be asked why, if they were so keen to get the Bill through quickly, it took them from 15 March until 9 June to formulate further amendments after the Bill came out of Committee and before it came back to the House on Report. If it took the Government and their civil servants three months to cobble together the amendments, why were we expected to deal with those amendments in about three days? The Leader of the House claimed that there was an agreement with him that if we did X, Y and Z the Bill would get through, but that is not true. It was not true at the time, and the fact that he repeats it at the Dispatch Box does not make it any more true today.

Nobody should forget that in the middle of the row about progress on the Housing Bill, the right hon. Gentleman went to see my right hon. Friend the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and threatened, "If you do not lay off on the Housing Bill, we will not be able to get the Short money for Opposition parties through the House." That is the standard of conduct that was being used to drive the Bill through the House earlier this year. We continue to object to such practices.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the row was not simply across the Chamber? One of the reasons for the delay of many months was an internal dispute in the Department of the Environment between Ministers charged with the passage of the Bill over what the Bill should contain. We were given many promises about concepts which would become law, but which never materialised.

Mr. Dobson: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman. We should have loved to be party to the aristocratic discussions about ordinary people's housing that were taking place between the Secretary of State and the then Minister for Housing and Planning. I am sure that they would have been most revealing.

The Bill, whether or not it has been amended by the Lords, reveals modern Toryism in its crudest form. It ultimately intends to offer two alternative forms of tenure: to be an owner-occupier, or to be a private tenant, no doubt of a Tory landlord. The object of the Bill is to take away security, drive up rents and, ultimately, to get rid of public sector housing, which has offered decent standards of housing, a decent level of security and affordable rents to millions of people, as it has been demonstrated for decades that the private commercial sector is, and will always be, incapable of providing a decent home for people who are not very well off at rents that they can afford, and maintaining those homes in a decent condition. Private landlords have never been able to do that. Nothing will be changed by passing a law in the House. It will remain impossible for private landlords to do a decent job for ordinary people.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that, apart from all the harm that the Bill will do in the public sector, it will endanger those who have reasonable accommodation in the private sector who are subject to regulated tenancies and who will be at the mercy of landlords who will know that when those tenants are evicted—legally or otherwise—the accommodation can be relet at market rents? Therefore, once again there is the potential danger of Rachmanism.

Mr. Dobson: My hon. Friend is right, but the Bill goes further than that. Under the assured tenancy concept in the Bill, the Government are trying to create the impression that something is assured for the tenant. The only things assured for the tenant are insecurity and higher rents.

I believe that the Bill is a precursor to removing whatever security private tenants now have and that we will have another Housing Bill in which the Government will try to line the pockets of their landlord friends and remove all security of tenure from private tenants. The Bill is a landlords' charter. It will encourage property speculators to roam council estates trying to identify those which they think they can buy up, tart up and sell off. The Government say that they have provided some protection against that by giving the tenants the opportunity to vote on whether they want a private landlord. That is all very well, until we discover the terms under which those referenda will be conducted. If General Pinochet had conducted the recent plebiscite in Chile on the basis on which the Government have said that tenants will be allowed to choose whether to have a private landlord, he would have won the referendum despite the views of the people of Chile.

Under the Bill, even the dead will be able to vote for a private landlord. In some senses that is quite reasonable, or at least logical, because only the brain dead would vote for a private landlord. That brings me to the House of Lords. Some people have said that they had hoped the House of Lords would introduce a more democratic element into the Bill. They do not realise that the full title of the House of Lords is the house of landlords. Most of them are landlords. They voted to impose the poll tax because they will do so well out of it financially. It will be interesting to know how many noble gentlemen and ladies declared an interest because of the money that they stood to make if the measures were passed, because they strengthen the hands and line the pockets and handbags of private landlords. In view of some of the backwoods people who were dragged out to support the Bill in the House of Lords, I understand how they might sympathise with the idea that the dead should be allowed to vote. That would guarantee an even bigger Tory majority in the other place.

The Bill does nothing to help most people presently living in public sector housing or private rented accommodation. Opposition Members are convinced that the Bill will create homelessness. Where will people go if they cannot afford to pay the new rents? Who will have the obligation to house them, and will those who have that obligation have any houses for them? There are no houses for them now. That is why they are reduced to living in lodgings. At the moment, about 10,000 of our fellow citizens in London live in filthy, stinking, rotting, verminous and vile bed-and-breakfast accommodation.

Conservative Members would not like the idea of living with their children in one room of a bed-and-breakfast hotel. None of them would like to think that their children, having had an interrupted night, and with no opportunity to relax and no space in which to play, had to get up in the morning and go to school. Conservative Members, particularly the right hon. Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), who poses as the Secretary of State for Education and Science, criticise teachers for not doing a good job. How can they do a good job with a small child who has not had a decent sleep, or anything decent to eat in the morning, no relaxation and no place in which to play? That is the position before this preposterous Housing Bill becomes law. Many people will become homeless after its passage.

It is logical that the Bill should harm the homeless, because it was the product of a White Paper on housing that talked about the housing of everyone except those who most need it—the people who are already homeless. The White Paper produced by the Secretary of State did not even mention the word "homeless". The right hon. Gentlemen pays so much attention to the problems of homelessness, which is at record levels, that he cannot even get the word into his White Paper.

I am glad that the Secretary of State is here today, because he was following a precedent that he set. He is good at leaving out important words. He was the man who laid down the rules for the future conduct of London Regional Transport. Faced with an Act of Parliament which said that LRT should consider economy, efficiency and safety, he wrote an 838-word letter telling LRT what its priorities were, but he did not mention the word "safety". It was all about economising and so-called efficiency. This Bill is all of a piece with the Secretary of State's record. He did not mention safety for people travelling on the Underground, and he does not mention homelessness when he is talking about housing.

That is the sort of person who, in a most incompetent manner, is presiding over the Bill. I feel rather sorry for the Leader of the House. It must be terrible having to cope with the right hon. Gentleman, whose incompetence and arrogance are an amazing combination.

This obnoxious Bill was not substantially improved by the House of Lords, and the House should have the opportunity to set right what the other place has done wrong. It should be given the time to put back into the Bill the measures which my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) has worked so hard to include. We must try to make a tolerable measure out of this intolerable Bill.

The Leader of the House heaped paeons of praise on himself for all the Bills that the Government had managed to get through this Session. Many of his friends in the Press Gallery—they were his friends until last Friday—said, "How clever he and the Prime Minister are to get all this controversial legislation out of the way in the first Session." There is a curious assumption that the Housing Bill, the Local Government Act which introduced the poll tax and the Education Reform Act are unpopular only in Parliament. The Government know how unpopular the Housing Bill is now. Just wait until it is put into practice, and then they will know how popular it is outside.

10.13 am

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): An engaging feature of the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) is that he never allows facts to get in the way of the arguments that he wishes to put. He takes no account of what has happened in the House when he makes his standard speech, with the standard amount of abuse, on guillotine motions.

I welcome the guillotine motion—[HON. MEMBERS: "The hon. Gentleman always does".] Unlike those Opposition Members who are talking from a sedentary position, I served on the Standing Committee that considered the Housing Bill and was present during many of the debates. There was a big difference between the debates in Standing Committee and our debates on the Floor of the House.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the Bill that has been returned to us from the House of Lords is vastly different from the Bill that we discussed in Committee and that we have a right to discuss those changes? Will he explain why the present proposals on the housing action trusts are different from those which we debated in Committee, or has he not noticed the changes?

Mr. Hughes: I always suspected that the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) was not listening in Committee, and I have been proved right. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave), the former Minister for Housing and Planning, generously agreed to make many changes to the Bill in Standing Committee, with the standard words, "We shall return to this and produce our own amendment when the Bill goes to the other place." The fact that he so generously responded to points made on both sides of the Committee cannot be used by the hon. Gentleman as a criticism. My hon. Friend kept his word and amendments were introduced in the other place. Of course, the Bill is different, but that is because of the points that were made during genuine debate in Committee.

Because of the Opposition's tactics we have not had a genuine debate on Report or on the Lords amendments to the Bill. I welcome the guillotine motion because I and many of my hon. Friends will wish to speak on some of the issues later today. We were not prepared to take part in a filibuster and time-wasting exercise by the Opposition. I remind the House of some of their tactics. To extend the debate on the homeless and to make a point about the housing conditions in some of our cities, on Report the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Hardy) made bird noises in the Chamber. We heard long speeches, including one from the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), that did not mention housing. The Report stage was a farce, and I was not prepared to take part in it.

During the debate on the Lords amendments, I and my hon. Friends listened with great interest, and with a sense of déjà vu, to a speech by the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney). It became clear that the hon. Gentleman was reading from the Hansard report of a speech that he had made in Committee. It did not make sense then, and he said it with even less conviction on this occasion.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): To my knowledge, the hon. Gentleman made no speeches during any stages of the Bill—[HON. MEMBERS: "He did."]—or made very few on the issues that I have always raised, and raised the other night on the Floor of the House: homelessness, housing those with special needs, and the Government's disgraceful record on repairs. If the hon. Gentleman had been a little more forthcoming about some of the matters that he mentions now, we would have known his views on the Bill. He was silent for most of the time.

Mr. Hughes: I understand the hon. Lady's disappointment. In Committee, I moved two amendments to the Bill, one of which was successful. The hon. Lady moved many amendments, none of which was successful.

Mr. Ian McCartney (Makerfield): The hon. Gentleman, not for the first time, has made a personal attack to hide the fact that he knows nothing about the plight of the homeless. I have made similar speeches in Committee, on Report and now because the Government have not yet answered the points made. I shall continue to say those things until the Government decide to deal with the problem of homelessness. The hon. Gentleman absented himself from the Committee on many occasions when he could have put his views on the homeless in London.

Mr. Hughes: I do not mind that attack from the hon. Gentleman. One has only to look at the records to note that my attendance rate was at least as good as that of the hon. Gentleman. I do not mind that.

I shall refer to some items that I would like to be discussed when we have a proper debate, rather than the Opposition's filibustering. The first item is homelessness. It is quite right that the Bill does not mention the word "homelessness". We do not need to mention the word "homelessness" to come up with solutions to the problem. The massive changes that are being made in housing supply——

Mr. Battle: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The Bill now mentions the word "homelessness". Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has not yet read it.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. That is not a point of order for the Chair; it is a point for debate.

Mr. Hughes: The variety of supply that this Housing Bill enshrines will be of enormous help to homeless people, and the added funds that will enable housing associations to do a better job will have a great effect on homelessness.

Another problem that will have a great effect on homelessness—I should like it to be discussed when we consider the remaining clauses of the Bill—is that of empty property. Opposition Members claim to be housing experts, but they are empty property experts. We have noticed that the people who speak loudest about the problem of homelessness in London come from boroughs in which Labour councils hang on to empty property and pretend that there is no way that they can fill it. They are the masters of empires of empty housing. The borough of Newham has several thousand empty properties.

The Inner London education authority—thankfully, to be taken from the people of London—has had some properties empty for 25 years. I can understand that it does not want to hurry itself into making a decision, but I am concerned about the people who could live in such houses. It is a disgrace that two properties in one road in Greenwich, which has a homeless persons problem, have been kept empty by the Inner London education authority and by the political friends of the Opposition for a long time.

Mr. Matthew Carrington (Fulham): Before my hon. Friend moves from the subject of homelessness and empty properties—a problem that has taxed many of us in London for many years—I should hate him not to mention the fact that Labour councils are not only keeping homes empty but Labour councils such as the London borough of Brent are keeping homes full of people—if reports are to be believed—from foreign parts, who perhaps have no entitlement to be there. The London borough of Brent does not realise that there is a black market in Nigeria —if that is the right expression—for filling homes with students who could well afford to pay for accommodation elsewhere.

Mr. Hughes: My hon. Friend has made an extremely important point. One thing that has kept so many flats and houses empty is the total chaos in which the Opposition's housing empires are run. If they try to rent out such properties, it would probably help if they had accurate records on whether they owned them. For instance, when the London borough of Tower Hamlets owned some property—I accept that that borough is now Liberal, but Opposition Members try to pretend that it is not—it would help if——

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (Derbyshire, West): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I wonder whether it could be confirmed that the hon. Member for

[Mr. Patrick McLoughlin]

Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) is handing to Opposition Members copies of the Govan by-election result. If so, may Conservative Members have some, too?

Mr. Hughes: Many properties are being kept empty because of the confusion, bad management and lack of political will and direction of Labour councils in London.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): The hon. Gentleman is making an important point about how better to use empty properties. Does he contest the statistics that show that the average level of empty property, as a percentage of total property, is lower among local authorities than among the empires, as he referred to them, of the Conservative Government?

Mr. Hughes: I accept that in the areas of most need in Greater London—in the centre of our city—thousands of properties are being kept empty by Labour councils. We should find that very unsatisfactory. Of course there are empty properties elsewhere, but, in areas of need, Labour councils are letting down the people of this country.

Mr. John Bowis (Battersea): Will my hon. Friend confirm that, in London, there are 25,000 empty council properties, mostly in Labour-run authorities, and 7,500 families in bed-and-breakfast accommodation? Not one of the people to whom the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras referred need have been in bed-and-breakfast accommodation or in the conditions to which he referred had his Labour authorities taken over such properties and put them back into use.

Mr. Hughes: My hon. Friend is absolutely right.

Mr. Spearing rose——

Mr. Hughes: It is significant that the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) seeks to intervene. The borough that he protects and represents is one of the worst offenders when it comes to keeping properties empty.

Mr. Spearing: Does the hon. Gentleman understand that no Labour council wishes to keep the homeless out of empty homes? Conservative Members should get some facts right. They know that, through the housing improvement programme, their Government cut money. In my constituency, there are 1,000 dwellings in the sky, because of the defective and rotten construction of tower blocks, for which private enterprise and bad design are responsible.

Mr. Hughes: Conservative Members should be generous and accept that, of course, Labour councils do not want to keep people out of that accommodation and that it is more a matter of incompetence than of not caring.

Mr. Spearing: It is money.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing), who is in danger of losing his seat in the next election because he has the largest swing against him, overlooks one important point about the London borough of Newham. It does not collect its rent. It is owed more than £3 million. If it were to collect that money, it could bring into use some of its 2,400 empty properties.

Mr. Hughes: The interest of Conservative Members and the reaction of Opposition Members demonstrate that that is an important point: there are two distinct views that we should like to discuss. The Opposition's tactics have led to the necessity for a guillotine motion to enable Conservative Members to make their contributions and put the arguments that floor the Opposition.

Mrs. Mahon: On the question of repairing empty council housing, will the hon. Gentleman explain how my local authority, Calderdale, which has been Tory or Liberal-controlled for the past 10 or 12 years, has an £80 million bill to repair council housing? His Conservative friends on the council have blamed his Government.

Mr. Hughes: A council housing empire, whether run by the Conservative party or the Labour party, does not work well. Opposition Members make an art form out of not running council housing empires well.

Mr. James Paice (Cambridgeshire, North-East): It will not have escaped my hon. Friend's notice that, because of the shenanigans and filibustering here on Wednesday night, Conservative Members have been prevented from discussing housing and homelessness. We have lost the debate that should have taken place this morning on that very subject, when, no doubt, the House would have been regaled yet again by the same speech from the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney).

Mr. Hughes: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention.

I wish to move on now to housing action trusts.

Mr. Simon Hughes: There is some amusement and concern among Opposition parties. The hon. Gentleman who has just intervened is unknown to Opposition Members. I wonder whether we could know who he is.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I suggest that hon. Members carry out their own research. There are plenty of reference books around.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: Bearing in mind that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) always claims to have a huge research staff, one would think that he would know my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Paice).

One reason why Opposition Members do not want the Bill to be debated properly in the House is that they know that some of the worst estates in this country are in areas where there is despair and grossly bad housing and that they have no answer to those problems. I refer, for instance, to the people of the Ocean estate in Limehouse. The Labour party poses as the friend of those people, but Opposition Members have never provided an answer to those people or decent housing in such areas. The Labour party has pontificated and Labour councillors have stood outside polling stations at local elections, saying "Vote for me today, love, and I will make sure that you will get a decent flat." The Labour party indulges in decent honourable politics like that, but has never done anything to help the people in those areas.

The reality of the housing action trusts is that the Government will produce a substantial amount of money to bring real and genuine help to those areas. That is what Opposition Members do not like and what they do not want to be debated. Under the Bill the HATs will be statutorily required to consult tenants about their plans for the future. That is right because, of course, tenants must be consulted about what will happen in their areas.

However, I hope that the people in the areas that the Government have designated as housing action trusts will understand that the Government are serious and genuine about wanting to bring them some relief and about wanting to see those areas thrive and prosper, with their people decently housed. People should look back at the record of the mainly Labour councils—there is one Liberal council—and ask themselves, "Has my council ever done anything to help me? Has the Labour party ever come up with a genuine solution to the problems of places such as the Ocean estate?"

Mr. Dobson: As the hon. Gentleman and his hon. Friends have been pedalling that lie for the past 100 years, will he explain why none of his hon. Friends represents an inner city area?

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Hughes: I am surrounded by inner-city colleagues who do not seem to think that the hon. Gentleman is right. What the hon. Gentleman might find slightly chilling is that, with the exception of the time when I was the opponent of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes)—I shall draw a veil over that because I did nearly as badly as the Labour party did yesterday in Govan—we have a record of success. We should consider the size of the swings in the number of votes from the Labour party, mainly to the Conservatives, when, for instance, I was the Conservative candidate for Stepney and Poplar and my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) was the candidate for Barking. The message has not yet got through, but it is getting through. People will understand that their real friends are the Conservative Government and that we are the people who will bring prosperity to those areas.

Some time—but not enough—was spent in Standing Committee discussing houses in multiple occupation. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West, then the Minister for Housing and Planning, stated:

"We shall propose a revised definition of an HMO. We shall propose that the management regulations on HMOs that apply minimum standards should apply to all HMOs. We shall also make proposals for simplifying and improving the control order procedure. We shall consult local authorities on means of making the registration scheme more effective."—[Official Report, 9 June 1988; Vol. 134, c. 1062.]

The point that I should have made if we had had a decent debate, and the point that I hope to make later today, is that one problem of houses in multiple occupation is fire. I hope that my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench will take that point on board either in this Bill or in the future. A recent survey sponsored by the Department of the Environment estimated that there are 343,000 HMOs in England and Wales. At the very minimum, that means that 1·25 million people live in HMOs. The survey also revealed that 74 per cent. of HMOs lack the legally required means of escape, so on those figures more than 1 million people are living in danger but do not have a right to be told of it.

Mr. McCartney: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) is reading the speech on multiple occupancy that I made on Report. I object to him using it without my permission. My research was invaluable.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman's objection does not constitute a point of order.

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Gentleman was right when he said that I was reading, but I was reading a press release from the Community Rights Project, which is an expert in this area. The part of the press release that I was reading was a quotation from an hon. Member of this House—the hon. Member for Harrow, West.

Mr. Julian Brazier (Canterbury): If the hon. Member for Makerfield (Mr. McCartney) had bothered to turn up for more than a handful of the sittings of the Standing Committee of which he was supposed to be a member, he would know that there had been changes in the arrangements for copyright in Hansard.

Mr. Hughes: As ever, I am grateful to my hon. Friend.

The Labour party is making such a fuss, but not necessarily strong arguments, because it has built up a head of steam behind its own scare tactics. Labour Members have been going around the country scaring people into believing that they will lose their homes and that there will no longer be any affordable homes. The opposite is the truth. Labour Members have used scare tactics in connection with previous legislation and their assertions were not true then. They have said, "If you buy your own home, you will be made homeless because you will not be under the care of the local authority." Those scare tactics need to be nailed, but Opposition Members are scared of their tactics being nailed.

Opposition Members are also scared because they recognise that this Bill is probably the most important Bill this Session. Opposition Members recognise, as I recognise and the Government recognise, that this is the beginning of the end of the housing empires on which the Labour party has thrived and from which people have suffered for so many years. When the Bill is enacted and takes effect, it will have a direct effect on homelessness. It will improve housing choice and housing conditions. The only people who will suffer are Labour Members and their votes in the inner cities.

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): Some of us would like to have known the view of the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) on several issues relating to the Bill. Unhappily, the Official Report of the Committee stage does not assist us greatly. Perhaps one of the arguments against the motion is that, if there had been the time, the hon. Gentleman might have intervened at this stage to give us his views.

After his contribution I will return to the motion. The case against it has been deployed clearly by my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) in so far as it relates to the Housing Bill. The other place was sent a Bill of 127 clauses and 15 schedules and of great importance to the homes of many of our constituents. Their Lordships considered it carefully, as we would expect—we would have complained if they had not—and sent us back 62 pages of amendments. Every consideration of constitutional propriety, every consideration of democracy, every consideration of common courtesy and of decency to the other place would suggest that we should give careful consideration to their Lordships' suggestions.

However, the Secretary of State for the Environment —or perhaps more accurately his right hon. Friends the

[Mr. Peter Archer]

Government's business managers—decided that we should deal with all the amendments in one day. When, in consequence, the hour grew late, they decided that the domestic arrangements of their supporters were more important than the Lords amendments and people's homes. So they would not consider these matters on Wednesday and now they want to bundle them all through in one day. In essence, that is what the motion is about.

Perhaps it has been worth having this debate, because we have heard some novel constitutional doctrines. We have heard from the Leader of the House that facts are not debatable and that if the Government say something three times, it is true. At least that is another footnote for the constitutional books of the future.

My principal concern relates not to the Bill in general, but to a more specific matter relating to Lords amendments Nos. 72 and 73 on housing action trusts which have given rise to great concern and anxiety in my constituency. I can imagine the Secretary of State saying, "What is your problem? I am now proposing to the House the very action that you have been urging on me, so I have seen the light." I could understand that submission, although I am not sure that "light" is the correct analogy with which to describe the Secretary of State's mental processes. I doubt whether much light penetrates the fog. I think that during discussions within the Government, they grasped, albeit belatedly, that—even accustomed as the Secretary of State is to mental bilocation—they could not at one and the same time maintain that the Bill is about offering tenants the right to choose and somehow enhancing their freedom while simultaneously denying them the voice on who their landlord should be.

There is a limit to doublespeak, even when the contradiction is between two propositions, both of which are false. But presumably, the Secretary of State intends to admit that he is wrong and is trying to put matters right. As that does not happen very often, perhaps we should encourage the Government in that well-doing. If there were time, some of us would do so. However, we would want to ask the Secretary of State a number of questions about the ballots, because there is still great anxiety about them.

It is only fair to help the Secretary of State to understand some of the implications of his own proposal——

The Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): Why did the right hon. and learned Gentleman not intervene in the debates on Report?

Mr. Archer: I did not do so for one simple reason—that those debates had not reached amendments Nos. 72 and 73. My concern is that we may still not reach them.

Mr. Ridley: I cannot let the right hon. and learned Gentleman get away with that. He has said that he is in favour of a ballot on HATs. He did not attend Report to say so, yet at that time the Government had not agreed to such ballots. Why did he not do so?

Mr. Archer: On Report we had no idea whose constituencies would be affected. Is the right hon. Gentleman suggesting that all 650 hon. Members should have intervened on Report just in case any of their constituencies would have HATs? If so, that cuts across the argument that the Leader of the House advanced this morning. Any such debate would have lasted for ever.

Mr. Soley: For the first time the Secretary of State—perhaps unintentionally—is in danger of misleading the House. In Committee, the then Minister for Housing and Planning promised to announce the HAT areas before Report. The Government reneged on that promise, so that on Report no hon. Member knew whether his constituency would be affected. Indeed, the Government admitted that they had failed to deliver. It is yet another sign of the mess in which the Secretary of State finds himself.

Mr. Archer: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for an intervention of fact.

If the Secretary of State had permitted, I would have said that we would have been prepared to discuss these matters with him at every stage. In answer to a question by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) on 14 June, the then Minister for Housing and Planning said that the Government had not decided on the HAT areas but that as soon as a decision was made he would tell us. I received a letter from the Minister dated 11 July. I presume that it was posted on that day, but it was certainly not delivered on that day. Yet, at 3.30 pm that very day, without even the courtesy of a telephone call, the Secretary of State announced to the House that there would be a HAT in my constituency. I assume that my hon. Friend the Member for Warley, East (Mr. Faulds) was treated in the same way.

Mr. Andrew Faulds (Warley, East): In fact, the obfuscation was much more profound than that. The Secretary of State did not want any right hon. or hon. Member to know what he was planning. I happened to receive, much before 11 July, an interesting and glossy document. I do not usually read the Government's propaganda, but for once I thought that I should peruse that document. On the last page, under local authorities in the west midlands, is mentioned Sandwell—Windmill lane. That was much before 11 July. I wrote immediately to my town clerk asking what it was about. He had never heard of it. There had been no consultation; there had been no discussion. I received the courtesy, if one can use the phrase about the right hon. Gentleman, of a letter dated 11 July, some weeks after this had blown.

Mr. Archer: It is certainly true that Sandwell council was not aware of that. Again, it was sent a letter dated 11 July. The first sign that councillors had that a HAT was proposed in their area was when they heard it on the television news that evening. The tenants were not told what had happened; they learnt about it in the same way. They then received a letter telling them what they already knew.

At that stage, the Secretary of State said that he was still prepared to consult, although even he did not try very hard to suggest that he was approaching the matter with complete objectivity or in a spirit of scientific inquiry. If he had at any stage consulted any of us, we could have spared both him and his Department a great deal of embarrassment. He would have found that, on some matters, we actually agreed with him. I certainly agree that there are problems in Sandwell. We have been trying to elaborate on them over the years. You, Madam Deputy Speaker—although I accept that I must not involve you in
